THE TICKET.

To some seekers after office political, the shades of night on the first day of the last summer month brought disappointment and chagrin, to others it was but the end of a perfect day. So semper politici! Ah, well, 'twas but a family row and though it frequently happens in our neighbors, the Republicans, and perhaps a bit of ammunition for their November race, there were no casualties and Primary wounds usually heal. As the Cynthiana people," came through in search of the lads, he rode one pony and led another for the use of the prodigal son on the return journey. He brought the boys in their rude clothes bracing venison and wild turkey, and they had a corn patch, though where the seed corn came from our storyteller allowed was information his sweeter failed to pass on.

"I say raise the old gentleman liked we lay of the land," and recognized the value of the spot as a suitable and for the location of a "stid-house," (a legal and popular term for those worthy and "road to Lexington," passing through Winchester, "a town of two houses," and "Athens, where the last faith of last pioneers. Then he returned to Virginia and brought out a colored man of all times and more and more we are coming to believe that the negro will be best governed by the continued existence of two major political parties, which parties should be held responsible for their respective administrations.

Now the game of politics is an interesting game for some, a horse for professionals for others, but for others it is an expensive experience and for a few it proves a rather disagreeable hore. Among the few the writer more than often may be classed. But that, as it may, having "sat in," to use the lingo of a game about which we know little, we feel some right to speak and "cash" our chips and "answer cards" and lookers and "call" and "raise" dare to say, we'll be horse-suggested if we won't abide by the rules of the game. We never enjoyed the mental exercises of the bid who there down his money-stack, or beat bait bid and returned to play, when his "side" lost, nor can we fathom the boy who have enjoyed the fun with his opponent and left at the big enough word showing for the other fellow to "come a finger about and lose the stack over his shoulder, who pouts and sulks and refuses to "play."

Flood the cause of good government as you will—and for good measure, jugging down the creek on his sure-footed mule. He had brought us a picture almost as vivid as Whittier's description of the low totally etched, of one incident in the forming of a Commonwealth. Some there were of those hardy spirits, who content with venison and wild turkey and partridge broiled over their wood fires; loving the early morning mists of their hills and the prayerful solace of the moon track in the quiet mountain waters; satisfied with a "patch of corn" and a clay-chinked cabin, tattered in the Highlands took root and reared their families. Others pushed on into the fable lands of the Bluegrass, into the Bottoms and the Purchase, some founding homes, a few pressing ever westward, all contributing their part in the moulding of a magnificent Commonwealth, in the founding of Kentucky.

AN INTELLIGENT ATTITUDE.

To The Mercury the question of levying a fair and equitable coal tax has proved a most perplexing problem, and one on which we are not yet prepared to express ourselves. It has always seemed to us that a tax on the coal actually mined would be the fairest possible way of assessing a tax on the producers, in that mines not in operation would not be required to pay this tax, where the present system taxes the mine owner whether the mine is producing or shut down. The mine owners say this means a double tax, that it would require an amendment to the Constitution to effect it, that it would prove ruinous to a business already in a bad way. There is much more that may be said, pro and con, and the whole discussion, unfortunately is badly meshed in the web of politics.

Consequently, it is refreshing to see the matter discussed as a business proposition, which was attempted recently in Kentucky, in a calm and dispassionate manner and without appeals to the prejudices of any group. The writer, Mr. William B. Ardery, is Bourbon county's representative in the legislature, and though he pays a "political entrance," he is clean cut and to the point and not without reason, in our opinion) he is the possessor of an active and well balanced mind, as evidenced by his attitude of suspended judgment concerning a matter of real importance.

Writing in a recent issue of the Paris Democrat, Mr. Ardery says:

"I have not had the opportunity to say about the coal situation lately for I have been out of the state and also by choice, and I believed it—to keep my lord and mouth closed.

Built my barns and strung my fences in the little border station
Tucked away below the foothills of the Cumberland Gap.

Till a voice, as bold as Conscience, rang intermonable changes
On our everlasting Whisper day and night repeated—so
"Something hidden. Go and find it, Go and look behind the Ranges—Something lost behind the Ranges. Lost and waiting for you. Go!"

So I went, went out of patience,
Sick and tired of the everlasting moan
Gazed in despair at empty
Spaces—Stretches of the arid
Plain—Passed the Rockies
Not once but twice
Crossed the Desert and the Sierras
And I've found it, and it's Mine!

Yes, your "Never-never country"—
yes, your "edge of cultivation"
And "no sense of going further"
till I crossed the range to see.
God forgive me! No, I didn't. But
God's present to our nation.
Nobody might have found it but
—His Whisper came to Me!

PERFECT DAY

When you come to the end of a perfect day,
And sit alone with your thoughts
While the gloaming ring out with a carol gay
For the joy that the day has brought,
Do you think what the end of a perfect day can mean
To a tired heart, when it draws near to the night and strong,
With a sweet that is kind and true,
For memory has painted this perfect day
In colors that never fade,
And we find at the end of a perfect day
The soul of a friend we've made.

SPARROWS

By Zella Wigent
Agricultural Extension Department, International Harvester Company.

The sparrow is the bird of the United States are sparrows. Of the more than 20 species comprising the family, all but the English sparrow are beneficial and valuable birds.

Sparrows are not fussy about their food. Weed Seeds form the bulk of their food, but at times they destroy many insects. This ability to adapt themselves to whatever conditions they meet and whatever they can find, no doubt accounts for their abundance. Fussy birds, like fussy people, have a hard time in the world.

Strong, clinical bills are characteristics of sparrows. They also have strong, thick stomachs. Nature has well fitted them to crush seeds and grind them fine so that all the nourishment stored in the seeds can be obtained.

The sparrow's flight is slow, inclined and heavy, a great contrast to the swift and graceful movements of the swallow. Since sparrows don't migrate far. Most of them are found in winter in the northern part of the United States winter in the Southern states, but they are replaced by the juncos snowflakes, tree sparrows and others that come down from Canada.

OUR "MOUNTAINS."

Leaving the "if-it-hadn't-been-fors" and the "I-told-you-so" and the usual primary postmortems, which already beginning to swirl in the stale atmosphere of taborer smoke Saturday night, were losing strength Sunday morning, we loaded the old car to the gunwales, so to speak, and headed eastward for our "mountains." And even there the "I-told-you-so" followed.

"Did you hear how the race for senator come out in Clark?", The same inquiry down the creek to where we stood, amazed at the voracious, yet none the less vicious eating of a fourteen year, whose home in the vine-covered trunk of an old locust we were being given to understand had not been placed there to be stared at by intruders. The voice continued and we left the little virago, who with tail cocked impudently, darted after us with a flood of vituperative language, and strolled back toward the group about the fire, where the odor of burnt acorn coffee mingled with wood smoke to form a perfume delectable which may not be purchased in bottles.

He had ridden up and hitched his mule a few moments before; had loosed one girth and made known his; had satisfied his yearnings for news political, and as we approached he seemed to be handling lightly and royally, but tastefully withal, upon farming there and elsewhere, the scarcity of labor, the thieving proclivities of the shiftless and the general "smartness" of the present generation. The man was a verit. able vest machine-gun, and his cartridge-belt of words seemed inexhaustible. But he was interesting, for from the fruitless and shattered ings of the youth of today he now lifted his verbal barrage from the present and dropped it into the distant, and hence rose-tinted, fields of the past.

He told us how his grandfather, at the age of fourteen, with a companion of the same age, had "run away" from their homes in old Virginia and walked through, bailing them a shanty boat on a mighty down the creek, and that when "great-grandfather," who had a "quarter" of money and "colored people," came through in search of the lads, he rode one pony and led another for the use of the prodigal son on the return journey. He brought the boys in their rude clothes bracing venison and wild turkey, and they had a corn patch, though where the seed corn came from our storyteller allowed was information his sweeter failed to pass on.

"I say raise the old gentleman liked we lay of the land," and recognized the value of the spot as a suitable and for the location of a "stid-house," (a legal and popular term for those worthy and "road to Lexington," passing through Winchester, "a town of two houses," and "Athens, where the last faith of last pioneers. Writing in a recent issue of the Paris Democrat, Mr. Ardery says:

"I have not had the opportunity to say about the coal situation lately for I have been out of the state and also by choice, and I believed it—to keep my lord and mouth closed.

The politicians in Kentucky are now doing. In addition to that, I am thoroughly aware of the existing and adverse conditions the coal industry has had to contend with and these conditions were brought about by over-production. The coal industry has also constituted a real menace to the industry, which was entitled to brought financial rain to the smaller operators.

Another development I have been awaiting of, and that is the recent proposal made to the Interstate Commerce Commission to increase the differential some fifty to seventy-five cents per ton on coal to all of the Great Lakes markets. Should this proposal be adopted its practical effect would be to give the operators in Ohio and Pennsylvania a monopoly of that market.

In order to be fair to the coal and the labor matters must be taken into consideration, and at the situation as it stands I will wait until the time comes for action before I shall attempt to say what the best plan is dealing with the coal tax problem is, certainly.

The trouble with the situation as it is, is that the painful part of the mine is made up of a lot of special interests, each one of which exerts special interests or selfish interests. As the situation stands, the coal tax situation is composed of ninety per cent politics and ten per cent business.

On the one side are the coal operators who fear that once they lose their majority in the legislature they will be confronted harsh as were conquered provinces in the days of the Roman Empire, and on the other to extremes in taxing their business. On the other are some sportsmen-like cases who do not care what becomes of the coal industry of Kentucky, either, so long as they obtain control of the legislature.

I belong to neither of these groups, but am a likely Boone a member of either one or the other. As matters stand I am in a position to say I am a political outcast, and consequently be adopted by everybody, as it exists in this State. I take pride in the fact that I am such and will so act. In that position I believe a good opportunity for service may be presented.

Every fair minded man knows the coal industry has not paid its fair share of taxes in the past. Some of their arguments are unsound and none of them false. They have there in States that tax the production of coal as an asset. They know that many of the States impose severance tax on minerals. They know that in this State there is a production tax on oil, and has been for several years, while there is no such tax on coal.

Fairness is needed on both sides and I am inclined to believe if the matter is approached fairly and reasonably a measure suffered to will be cleared away."

THE UNPOETICAL "CHIGGER."

Let it be stated in the interest of science and for the evertastin' satisfaction of that kind of a word which the "Homefolks" eulpsm in the Courier-Journal, that while musing on the wonders of a tree, which only God can make, and watching a summer tanager feed her young, a flock of red spiders, commonly known as "chiggers," descended upon this mortal frame of ours, staked out a claim and started drilling operations, which some are now well under way. In order to save our face as a "philosopher and poet," some words that Jim Allen, over in Cynthiana, called us right out in cold print 'nother day, we are forced to resort to fundamentalism and allow that the good Lord let the Old Boy try his hand at the chigger. Anyhow, if the Democrats scratch in November anything like . . . (dots, indicating profanity, courtesy forbids the . . . . . didn't they that one) like we are now. Heaven . . . help the tinker!

WHAT HO! THE PIPE O' PEACE!

Now the tomahawk is sharpened and
Primary fires are lit,
And the treaty pipe is poison arrows fit;
Now to scalp your dear opponent
seems an action very fit,
Or to brain him after gouging out
his eyes!

With what he politicos? Who-bath watched him at vote-getting?
Who hath followed him along the Stolen track?
Seen him work the chosen precinct,
seen him smiling, toiling, sweat-
ing,
Seen the "floater" jumping-crazy for the "jack"?

We must go—go—go away from here!
In the other camp they're settin
mighty store—
On winning in November, so for
Heaven's sake remember,
And let us all be Democrats once more.

(Apologies to Kipling, and thanks, the chigger's that this is all).
