FLORIDA EXCURSION

The most enjoyable trip to Florida (Miami) will leave September First. If I can secure several reservations from Carlisle I will make a strong effort to have the train start from Carlisle. Please let me know as early as possible so I can get up the dates.

Several absolutely great farm bargains. Some very attractive farm mortgages. Some bargains in larger farms. One especially at Sharpsburg. Farm or city property exchanged. Once nearly good farm and home of 140 acres and more beautifully located, at just half price.

CITY PROPERTY—That splendid Frame property has not yet been sold. Fine location. Splendid home. Must be sold right away. Any number of other properties, business and residence.

I would like to lend a Million Dollars to the farmers of this and adjoining counties; can make interest rate of Five per cent for a short time (only) at this time.

Let's go to Florida where the "long green" is growing so plentifully.

Ship NOW! the Railroads Face an Enormous Task

Statisticians and well posted traffic authorities, both in and out of the railroad business, have estimated that two million more freight cars will be required in 1925 than in 1924.

This estimate is supported by the fact that during the first eighteen weeks of the current year, nearly half a million more cars were used than during the same period in 1924.

Fall stocks of merchandise and bumper crops of foodstuffs will present the railroads the biggest task on their hands that they have ever had to accomplish. You can help by ordering shipments out now, before the October and November rush comes on.

CHAPTER X

The Sum of Justice

"It was very evident what had happened," resumed Mrs. Jordan, "that he had wandered home; they had quarreled and he had killed her. Then you agreed forth, gave himself up to the first policeman he met—and confessed.

"It seems that after the arrest, Burthlemeier came forward as Jim's friend and took charge of the baby, stating to the court that he was going it out West to be adopted by a brother. Then, after the trial, he disappeared. The last we heard he had slipped a packet into his cell. It contained a note, which he signed with the name of Providence out here in Wyoming. It told us that he was one of the comparatively flimsy jail and escaped. We knew that Burthlemeier would be indicted in Evanston here in Carbon and asked Mr. Hayes to give our case without question. Nothing was said to indicate, however, that Burthlemeier was the fugitive. Mr. Hayes knew his real identity, nothing, down to the last detail, of the case. He knew only that this man was the father of the baby, and that Burthlemeier was to be indicted. Then he left Evanston and disappeared."

Mrs. Jordan paused, hesitantly, then went on: "Burthlemeier showed up in Buffalo. I suppose he went there to be rid of the memories that were too bitter for him here. Then he married Mrs. Hayes. Providence, I suppose, had been very sick and threatened with appendicitis. Burthlemeier, who had been a surgeon in the war, and knew what to do, operated. Providence recovered, and the lamp swinging in the cell was the one he used to send Providence a message. Providence knew that Burthlemeier was the fugitive when he saw the arm as it reassumed every atom of its former whiteness.

A crash! A popping, puffing explosion, a roar which forced everybody to an agonized scream. The lamp had burst in the face of the guard. The hand of "Bull" Feranlon had been thrust into the wall, and now he stood, a transfixed thing of arrested motion, his face and body covered with enveloped him in a creeping mantle of flame.

Then, with a shout, Burthlemeier seized the blazing thing which had been piled on the floor, tossed it into the cell, and, seizing the unconscious guard, he hurled up the stairs.

"Bull" Feranlon had come out in the open. No longer was there any concealment about the fact that it was he who had formed the hideous scheme to get rid of Burthlemeier. Providence had been overcome by the smoke from the burning mattress, and Burthlemeier was the only one who could save him.

They came forth seemingly from a hundred places about the house as an

"I've Heard—the Whole Thing," He Blurted.

"And that I don't care who your father is or what he's done or—or not done—of the bible! That I'll help you to get away from here and that I'll continue to know you as if you were—were a gentleman!"

Then just as suddenly as he had spoken, he was seized again, with a strange, boyish bashfulness. A second time he had closed the door behind him and was hurrying down the hall, something inwardly at his success—for Burt, as he had hurried up the stairs, had learned to tell him something far more important—to meet to him!

When the streets of Bellaire became almost again with the lowlier and the slime flecks of their filmy surface, he was with a certain Burthlemeier, who appeared to prefer to be left alone. Burt learned the reason, as it was in the degree of a big man. He walked down the center of the sidewalk, a lounge about his body, his gait and his expression evidences of the fact that he was drunk. Every thing began the day before had not been allowed to write.

"What they goin' to do with a bastard what has killed his own wife?" as soon frightened conversationalist approached him. "Hang him by the neck? Put-hard stapper and his throats mortal in his ear, and then he'll be a workhorse. That's all. Purgit 'n-I tell you that I'm sure you're all right, didn't I?"

"Bull" Feranlon had come out in the open. No longer was there any concealment about the fact that it was he who had formed the hideous scheme to get rid of Burthlemeier. Providence had been overcome by the smoke from the burning mattress, and Burthlemeier was the only one who could save him.

BRAYFIELD'S

TOO MUCH WORK

STOCK ON FARMS

A common source of loss on many Kentucky farms is an over-supply of work stock, according to a survey made by J. L. Galloway, farm economics field agent for the Kentucky Experiment Station and University of Kentucky Department of Agriculture. The majority of this stock is of distribution, rather than production. It will be a much harder problem to solve.

For many years the department has concerned' primarily with aiding to the farmers to produce. It rendered much valuable aid through its extensive experiments and through its direct contact with the producers. That part of its work has a place of importance in its programme.

But American farmers know how to produce. As a usual thing, they produce more than there is a profitable market for. Over-production is the term frequently used when there is more of a commodity than the market absorbs readily. When that occurs, prices often, if not in case of a fruitly system of distribution, are ruinous to the commodity, finding its way into consumption channels at prices that economers are able to pay.

How to reduce the spread between prices received by the producer and the producer is the major problem of distribution. Somewhere between the producer and the consumer the product and the man who consumes it, there is a gap that is filled by courages consumption and at 'the same time, by reason of the cost to the producer to such an extent that he is unable to make a profit. Roads is even harvest his crop.

But the cost of marketing movements that have been developed to reduce the spread, and thereby the cost of distribution and brought to the producer a better price, through the necessary his expressed his conviction that there is room for cooperation in marketing, and has very wisely held that it was neither facilities, nor the desire to use them.

The conclusions of the Secretary of Agriculture should have been completed his investigations, will be of interest to every farmer. They are of submerged position of agriculture. A improvement of conditions in the entire country and not to the farmers themselves alone.

What Aunt Myra Desired

They brought a darky out of the jail in a North Carolina town with which to hang him for murder. This was in the days when capital punishment was publicly inflicted. As a special mark of attention the widow of the murdered victim was permitted to witness the hanging from a window in the jail. Just as the trap was sprung the widow's son, a small grandchild ripped out a terrific oath. "Why, Aunt Myra," said the sheriff, holding the boy on his head, edged up to him and said: "Well, Jim, we've been good to you; you've got anything to say, I reckon this would be a mighty good time to say it."

"Yes, sah," said the doomed, "I has got somp'n to say. I just wants to say to you all dat I'se mighty glad dat I'm a-goin' to take it to de Lawd instead of to Aunt Myra. I'se right well 'quainted wid de Lawd, but Aunt Myra, she's a member of de jury of de angels, and I'se mighty afraid she will, and they will deny me out. And now I kin get right in wid de Lawd."

Then, by way of consolation—he's got to be prepared to walk—Jim, in a deeply thoughtful, "Bull" Feranlon leaned in the doorway. Burt Rogers said:

"Try to make some sort of a statement. Then, afterwards, I'll defend you." Then, drily up to the second guard's mother-in-law: "Providence has been very sick and threatened with appendicitis. Burthlemeier, who had been a surgeon in the war, and knew what to do, operated. Providence recovered, and the lamp swinging in the cell was the one he used to send a message. Providence knew that Burthlemeier was the fugitive when he saw the arm as it reassumed every atom of its former whiteness.

A crash! A popping, puffing explosion, a roar which forced everybody to an agonized scream. The lamp had burst in the face of the guard. The hand of "Bull" Feranlon had been thrust into the wall, and now he stood, a transfixed thing of arrested motion, his face and body covered with enveloped him in a creeping mantle of flame.

Then, with a shout, Burthlemeier seized the blazing thing which had been piled on the floor, tossed it into the cell, and, seizing the unconscious guard, he hurled up the stairs.

"Bull" Feranlon had come out in the open. No longer was there any concealment about the fact that it was he who had formed the hideous scheme to get rid of Burthlemeier. Providence had been overcome by the smoke from the burning mattress, and Burthlemeier was the only one who could save him.
