JUNE

It comes, but with the rush and glow
Of a prodigal who has
A below life of a below brook,
Is the June of June.
That to the fledging woods
Sings a quiet tune.

But back to our find. The writer had intended to stop his car an hour or two and spend the night Sunday morning. It was some two hours before the sesquicentennial celebration was scheduled to start. But when he found he could get a room at a hotel, a bath, a shave and breakfast, he decided he would be more than repaid for the loss of a night's sleep. So he pushed on and arrived in Harrodsburg in time to see the parade. A prosperous appearing throng was assembled. The weather was ideal. The parade was a good one. Many floats were in line, all of them showing much thought and work. Some were beautiful, some were quaint, some were historical, some were humorous. We had time to see only a few of the floats, but after all the men had marched and floats had passed, we had a wife to see every one of the floats. Mrs. W. S. Agnew, Carrollton, was there with a float, so we had to see that. We don't want to say which float we liked best. We thought the one which showed a dugout of the pioneer days was the best. But that was natural, it seemed to us, for it was the most difficult. "Grace" was the name of the float. It was beautiful, and it was well worked out. We guess it was the best. But we liked the one which showed the old log cabin, and the one which showed the old log church, and the one which showed the old log school house. We guess we liked them all. But we liked the one which showed the old log cabin best because it was the most difficult. "Grace" was the name of the float. It was beautiful, and it was well worked out. We guess it was the best.
