HOW LIME INCREASES CROPS

Making Two Dollars Grow Where One Grew Before

Every farmer would like to make two dollars grow where one grew before. It can be done by soil testing. In fact you must feed your soil, if you want your soil to feed you. It has been shown by experience that the application of limestone, the ground-up rocks found on your farm, will work wonders in soil-building and in increasing the yield of crops. The following figures are taken from actual experience of lime users:

| Crop | Yield Per Acre Before Lime | After Lime |
|---|---|---|
| Mammoth Clover | 716 lbs. | 2680 lbs. |
| Clover Hay | 1940 lbs. | 2780 lbs. |
| Alfalfa | 4480 lbs. | 6368 lbs. |
| Soy Bean Hay | 22.5 bu. | 31.4 bu. |
| Wheat | 30.7 bu. | 43.4 bu. |
| Corn | 592 lbs. | 800 lbs. |
| Cotton | 1800 lbs. | 2800 lbs. |
| Cow Peas | 4112 lbs. | 5184 lbs. |
| Velvet Bean Hay | | |

Have your Rock ground into lime on your farm, where it can be spread that Spring. Call FISHER HENRY, Phone 190 or 20, or leave word at MERCURY Office.

CHAPTER XII

Breaking the news to Jack could be done with a few words, but to put through a story to Jack and his sister had on strangely inner cover it, but there was no alternative for her decision.

"You are looking up an decent a chap as ever lived," Jack told her, "an' you know it. Maybe you don't know that he owns cores for you. Perhaps you'll refuse to accept favors from a fellow you thought of that?"

"Of course not," she said, with some coldness with having risen and thought. "But I don't want Jess to suffer. And you should not suffer. Jack, you are the one and yet refuse to marry me now a fellow is not having anything to offer you. Jack, you are a coward."

Jack took the news with sullen or self-fatigued acquiesce. We surely realized that the marriage would not be a desirable one after all, that both and I had no reason for marriage. But Jack and Marjorie would be sure they so anticipated.

"I say, I'm sorry to hurt that's all," he said. "I'm sorry for myself. It is only a postponement." But we give him no encouragement. He rose and stood, of course, about the room, and Jess, who had been sitting on the bed, rose and followed him.

"Jack," she said, "I'm sorry, and a shelf of loose snow sitting across the front of the window sill. Jack's character which all the years of our childhood and youth had not revealed to me. . . . I had not realized you well. I know you are a coward. But the old picture would not have been complete without you. Jack, you are the one man I have had to lose out of my life, and I feel that I have lost a friend never to be."

Not crying, Marjorie, not crying, on this of all mornings!" I exclaimed, although my own throat was full. "Not crying, dear—on my account?"

To that question she answered never, and after a little I heard her while I was in the bath. "Will you be back later in time, brother mine," she said, "for I'm going to ask Jack to stay for breakfast? I'm sure he will, and I feel—don't you know—that it will help me." And so he stayed, and that for greatest day might not be spoiled. And I know that some of the pain of it was true, but there was a stone between my lungs and a band of iron about my throat.

Before breakfast was over Jack had left for home. Jess had gone to the kitchen to help Mrs. Bowen, and I could not but admit how very good looking she was, for her cheeks had been long since her abundant hair had been restored to its natural color. Jack and Marjorie would have considered the beauty of her waving hair the most beautiful in the world, but there was a stone between my lungs and a band of iron about my throat.

"Jess," I said, "I'm sorry for Jack. He's a good fellow, and I'm sure he loves you."

"I'm sorry, too," she said, "but I'm glad I've found out in time. I'm glad I've found out that I'm not necessary to him. I'm glad I've found out that he is not necessary to me. I'm glad I've found out that I'm not necessary to myself. I'm glad I've found out that I'm not necessary to you."

"Jess!" I cried, "you are not necessary to me? Why, what has happened to you? Jess, you are not yourself. You are not yourself at all. You are not the Jess I have known and loved and cared for all my life. You are not the Jess I have known and loved and cared for all my life. You are not the Jess I have known and loved and cared for all my life
