IT ALWAYS HAS RAINED

The weather bureau man at Lexington says that all of us make this miserable weather worse by constantly fretting over something we can't help. His advice is good, when he warns that every time we bend to bear it, and then try to forget the heat as much as is humanly possible.

Forgetting the heat is quite a large order these days, but that our mental reactions to hot weather increases the bodily heat, even if it has no effect on the thermometer, may not be denied. Perhaps a daily row of dirty dishes due in every ward" was the parting remark and desire to make and relief from unpleasant things during October able, to men, as well as to crops, much to be put on to better mental uses by stated the breaking of bodily ailments.

Interesting from the philosophic of our subject is the man who, when for the hour is parched, cracked and dusty, and the mercury is climbing delicious pictures with all of which a cruel fate may be affected at one time, or the other, by the heat, or the rain of his years. "The always have with me," he says, "the cool days I got flat out that week I was hoeing the gift of corn in the hot sun."

HIMP RENASCENT!

In connection as Natchez runs the Lexington Herald concludes that the Lexington Herald concludes that "the old-time Himp is not dead, but, on the contrary, is full of health and vigor."

Then there's another man who says everybody ought to be placed as well as he is original by which being next to nothing. Then there's the man who says he is the envy of every million men in the country.

The most miserable man, however, is the one who's content with his lot, who is never envious of anybody else's success, who is satisfied
