THE COUNTRY DOCTOR

Before his death Thomas Elroy Marshall, the Homer who whom the Democratic party call-to be the running mate of Woodrow Wilson and who escaped the vice presidency throughout the war, wrote a book "in the hope that the tired business man, the unsuccessful golfer and the lonely husband whose wife is out reforming the world may find therein a half hour's surcease from sorrow." —Lexington Herald.

We must have that book. Tom Marshall was a genuine American, shrewd, kindly, unassuming, possessed of a sense of humor, which enabled him to see through trappings of cant and bombast. He could strip the strut from a pseudo-statesman with that naive nonchalance with which he threw into the midst of a heated debate in the Senate, the bland assertion that "what this country needs most is a good five-cent cigar." His book should make good reading.

But what interests us particularly in the Herald's review of Mr. Marshall's posthumous work is the reference to the passing of the country doctor, which is, as the Herald observes, a problem for us without a point of fact that lower standards for admission to the profession have been suggested."

The country doctor of a generation ago was a mighty figure in his community. Where the type still exists, one is apt to find some grizzled conqueror of countless battles with disease, a doughty veteran of midnight rides through storm and rains and biting winds, whom the neighborhood still looks upon as a healer of broken souls, a comforter of broken hearts, as well as a minister to physical needs.

All of this they were, those country doctors of the old school. They blundered, no doubt; perhaps they worshiped too much at the shrine of the Great God Calomel; they took sad of tongues; they scorned the stethoscope more than often for a good ear to the chest; agnostic sarpois they missed maybe; but they brought the cheer of life into lonely sick rooms and in the balance of hope for pain-racked bodies.

He doled out his powders on the end of a knife-blade; he cut a twig from the peach tree at the window and swabbed your throat; and while his Dover's powder brought a moisture to fevered brows and sleep to aching eyes, he talked and laid on the grown-ups, and if you were a youngster and the patient, you squirmed a bit and wondered if his wizard of pills and potions had forgotten that you were the reason for his call. He hadn't to know that now, for this man had been impressive at your premises; he had spanked the first stricken waif from you, when an Irwin Cobb says, you resembled nothing in the world so much as a sore thumb, and the shrewd old eyes watched while the tongue wandered now to a flask of wild ducks he had seen on a nearby pond, and a fox trotting across a moonlit ridge, taking all hunting and fishing that helped you forget the pain of an aching head—and suddenly forgetfulness came in the midst of his chuckle at some favorite anecdote.

There is a picture which once had a great vogue in country homes. It was called, "The Doctor." The mother sat with head bowed upon her arms; the father stood tense in his tortured waiting. Beside the pallet of the sick child, with chin in hand and eyes intent upon the sleeping face of the child, sat the doctor. He was a country doctor, one is sure, and we never see that picture, but there comes to mind a quotation from Oliver Goldsmith:

> Careless their merits or their faults to scan,
> His pity gave ere charity began.
> Thus to relieve the wretched was his pride,
> And even his failings leaned to Virtue's side.

Written of a minister, but equally descriptive of many a country doctor.

And his like is passing or has passed. In many isolated communities there are no doctors. Hospitals in every county-seat town would help to solve the problem. This is possible in nearly every county, for the Legislature has empowered the fiscal courts to submit a bond issue for such purpose. Where this is not feasible, however, it seems to us that the Federal Government might share the expense of employing a country physician, where the community is unable to maintain one.

NATURE—THE FARMER'S ALLY.

Farmers are warned by the United States department of agriculture that high prices for farm products are not due to increased demand, but to under-production, brought about largely by crop failures.

It would be a wonderfully fine thing for the farmer, if he would but heed this warning, yet it is scarcely reasonable to expect him to do so. Not so long, at least, as human nature, the immutability of which has been noted throughout the ages, remains the same.

Men have not yet reached that state of development, it seems to us, where they recognize the value of true co-operation. When a harvest turns in rich, there is a rush the following spring to dig in the soil, to cover the face of the earth with the gold-producing crop, which at once becomes a "non-buyer" in the golden-crop market. Farmers are constantly killing the goose that lays the golden egg, constantly failing in the face of the law of supply and demand, a law as unchangeable as that of the Medes and Persians.

But, what's to do? One can't prevent over-production on farms by laws; the time has not come, we think, when the farmers of the world may say to one other, "We will raise so much of this commodity and no more." A Utopian state of universal brotherhood and a radical change in the nature of human beings must come to pass before such an ideal condition is realized.

The efforts of men to prevent over-production of farm products, are puny at best. One fears it would be a losing battle, except that over and again Nature steps in with a drouth, a pestilence of insects, a plant disease borne on the wings of the wind, and restores the balance.

"Nature," says Disraeli, "is more powerful than education; time will develop everything." We would not discourage all this. Perhaps it will take the stirrings of men so well on the immensities of natural causes to solve the problem of the farmer. It is heartening, however, to feel that in his battle against a flooded market and prices which will not repay his labor, the tiller of the soil may depend upon an ally, which is always the same, yet never the same."

"Nature, the vicar of the Almighty Lord," wrote old Geoffrey Chaucer nearly six hundred years ago. A thought to banish ulcers.

LUTHER BURBANK.

Luther Burbank is to relinquish his scientific active control of his experiments. But Mr. Burbank is not to retire. That he should retire would death claims him is unseemly conceivable. His work it too inspiring, too intensely enthralling. One imagines that it is his very life.

To us Luther Burbank is the greatest American of his generation—a rather sweeping statement, for greatness is relative—but in the matter of achievements of real worth to his generation we believe it will be found that he excels those statesmen, captains of industry, leaders of armies and makers of books, whose accomplishments are heralded by all the tremendous power of advertising.

A wizard of Nature's secrets, this man, who at seventy-six refuses offers of a quarter of a million dollars for his gardens; delving into the lore of the Universal Mother with a mind almost psychic in its ability to read her secrets; selecting, crossing, tracing the evolution of growing things with infinite patience; turning an obnoxious weed into a valuable forage plant; tracing the evolution of corn from a grass of the swamps; achieving results enormous in extent, of type in plant and tree and flower.

A truly wonderful man! And did Jonathan Swift, at last, pass in his our estimation of his value to the race.

> "And he gave it as his opinion, that whoever could make two ears of corn, or two blades of grass, to grow upon a spot of ground where only one grew before, would deserve better of mankind, and do more essential service to his country than the whole race of politicians put together."

THE FAIR.

Nicholas county's second Agricultural Fair will be held at Carlisle from today. Every effort has been made by the committee in charge to make this year's event more enjoyable and instructive than the splendid fair held last year.

Under the direction of our county agent, Mr. S. W. Anderson, a fine premium list has been prepared and arrangements made for capable men from the agricultural department of the University of Kentucky to act as judges in the various departments. A great deal of interest will be added this year to make the Fair more enjoyable, and the management has had fifty thousand school children. Of these the best ones in each grade are being studied in greater detail and their development examined as closely as possible.

In school work they surpass in all directions as a group and display a wider range of information. They are not freakish or irregular in their abilities. There is nothing strange or mystical in their interest outside their studies. They enjoy work and play games, though they like games with thinking in them. They differ from the general run in degree rather than in any way that sets them off as fundamentally different. Their development is nothing strange or early age, though it is not always discovered by backward children for sufficient opportunity for full play in school work.

Some of the children who were tested of early studies fourteen or fifteen years ago are now showing unusual ability in accounting for their superior intellectual ability.

Sometimes parents often ask, "Are we pushing our child too much in school?" He is not pushed. He lags and we are afraid he is learning little. We should like to see the child let him advance in his school work.

THE LOSS OF $250,000,000.

Irregular attendance in the schools throughout the United States, according to estimates made by the bureau of education, causes the waste of approximately $250,000,000 each year. The waste affects the lives of a school system depends on the regularity of attendance of the pupils enrolled as well as on the ability and the teaching staff. A recent study of 72,120 country children in 1,000 one-room schools showed that the median number of days of school attendance of children was 141.7 days. Half of the child attended school less than 7 1-2 months, over one-fourth of the children attended considerably less than 5 months, and over one-eighth of them attended less than 3 months. Attendance in consolidated schools was slightly better in one-room rural schools. The median daily attendance and 60 per cent, respectively—was higher in schools providing free transportation for the pupils than in those providing no such transportation. This evidently indicates that longer terms usually mean better daily attendance. Pupils with less than 130 days of schooling averaged over 1 1-2 years below grade in reading and spelling while pupils in one-room school averaged about seven months below grade in these subjects. Many people expect too much of the rural school and are more likely to attend school during busy seasons. A more rigorous school, no doubt, is the strenuous objection of parents in considering it less serious for the younger children than for the older children in the same school. Trivial excuses such as "went to town," "ran an errand," "got up too late," "had chores required at home," are legion. Closer cooperation between the teacher and the parent should result in better attendance.

Cynthiana Democrat—

Otis Ballenger sends a newspaper clipping about an English woman who has been carrying the same umbrella since 1864 and thinks it may be ours. Now, here! Our umbrella was not lost till 1896, when we were bread.

Each day he had come for a year of days,
And groped his way to the Bend.

"What's the Devil's Harvest to-day?" he cried;
"A waiter with eyes of blue!
I've known too many a such," he sighed,
"Maybe I know them . . . mom Dear?"

He raised the head of the heedless Dead;
He favored the frozen face. . . .
Then a deathly spell on the watch-fire fell;
God! it was still, that place!

He raised the head of the careless dead,
He fumbled a vagrant curl;
And then with his sightless smile he said:
"It's only my little girl."

"Dear, my dear, did they hurt you so?
Come to your daddy's heart. . .
Aye, and he held so tight, you know,
They were hard to force apart.

No! Parts isn't always gay;
And the world has its stories too;
You're a waiter of tales, you say—
Then there is a tale for you.

RIGHT CHILDREN SUPERIOR

Child Health Talks by Dr. Thomas D. Wood, Director, Bureau of Child Health, Department of Health, Louisville, Ky.

The old idea that bright children are supposed to be more delicate and different from their less gifted brothers and sisters, is far removed from the work of Dr. Lewis M. Terman, head of the department of psychology of Stanford University. Since 1916 Dr. Terman, and his staff of fourteen associates, has examined by means of tests and fifty thousand school children. Of these the best one per cent are being studied in greater detail and their development will be followed as closely as possible.

These superior children have been found to be as a class a taller, heavier, larger boned, stronger and healthier than the average of unselected children of their age. Their ancestry are also somewhat larger lived than the average. Better proportioned physically, more stable nervously, these precocious children are developing as rapidly as the old ideas.

In school work they surpass in all directions as a group and display a wider range of information. They are not freakish or irregular in their abilities. There is nothing strange or mystical in their interest outside their studies. They enjoy work and play games, though they like games with thinking in them. They differ from the general run in degree rather than in any way that sets them off as fundamentally different. A WORD OF CAUTION

The United States department of agriculture sounds a word of caution to farmers in its current crop report.

The warning is that the high prices for farm products are not due to increased demand, but to under production brought about largely by crop failures.

The danger of over production is always staring the farmer in the face, and he should be careful not to plunge into production with great energy. Nature, however, is the greatest ally of farmers are inspired with the same incentive, they awake to find the bottom fallen out of the market, due to a surplus of production.

The warning is timely and should be carefully considered in making crop plans for next year.

BURBANK TURNS OVER GARDENS TO SCIENTISTS

(Lexington Herald)

Luther Burbank at seventy-six, is to let his gardens pass into the hands of science. He will retire under the guidance of Leland Stanford University in California, but will not retire. So long has he dwelt among the plants and flowers that he has no desire to desert them. Especially since they have grown as high as a quarter of a million dollars' worth. Hence, he will "commercialize" them.

The genius that is this remarkable man has been spent developing new plants by selecting for further breeding and crossing. By plaiting and grafting for further breeding the plants which tend toward the variation he desires, he has directed evolution, bringing best tendencies in plants for possessions.

Among his greatest achievements is the spineless cactus, whereby he turned an obnoxious weed into a forage plant. He gave perennial growth to a species of rhubarb, increasing its stalk from pencil size to the thickness of a man's wrist. He fashioned the skin of California plums, that they might better stand shipping. He developed the stoneless plums and many other improvements in fruit.

HIDDEN TREASURE

I dream of the sparkle of diamonds
The crystalline eyedrops of dew,
The pick of the sweet damask roses
In an old-fashioned garden I knew;

The green of the depths of the ocean,
Where pearl shells and coral are strewn,
The emerald tinge of the foliage,
Where nightingales sing to the Moon.

The pigeon blood ruby of the ruler,
The jet of stainless glass,
The glory of dawn on the mountains
The glitter of frost on the grass
Oh, these are the visions that thrill me

And fill me with rapture divine.
When I look at the Valentine,
I raised in the garden of mine.

Mrs. Fuller Hostess

—Mrs. J. Myers Fuller was hostess to several tables of bridge at her home on North Street, honoring Mrs. John Chrisp, left on his errand. Instead of stopping at the cow pasture, however, he went to Cynthiana and enlisted in the army. At the conclusion of the war he located in Cincinnati, where he now lives.

The aged colored man is now 76 and states that he does not remember his age at the time he left this county, but that it was "the year of the big flood."

Tyler is a brother of Elijah Tyler.

Rehearsals have been started for a home talent show to be given at the city hall on Thursday and Friday nights during the agricultural fair under the auspices of the Civic Chamber of Commerce. The performances will not begin until after the evening programs at the fair.

From the frequency with which the law is violated, many automobile owners are doubtless unaware of the fact that there is a Kentucky statute which governs the speed of automobiles. There is also a city ordinance against this which should be enforced. There is no excuse for the noise caused by automobiles—motorcycles on the cut-outs on the streets of Carlisle.

The University of Wisconsin has a new surgeon, who is giving his time to this humanitarian work, will perform the operation Saturday morning.

60 YEARS AGO SENT FOR COW; RETURNS MONDAY

Sent by his master to the cow pasture to drive in the cow, more than sixty years ago, Tom Tyler, colored, returned to his old home in Carlisle this week. He didn't bring the cow.

It was during the troublous days of the war between the States that Tyler, who belonged to the late John Chrisp, left on his errand. Instead of stopping at the cow pasture, however, he went to Cynthiana and enlisted in the army. At the conclusion of the war he located in Cincinnati, where he now lives.

Social—Society

SEPTEMBER

September in a golden gown thrills us with its witchery;
The fragrance of the wild grapes is clinging to her hair;
All the heavens bend to her their tenderest blue regard,
Brimming with a beauty that is laughing at despair.

Goldenrod is nodding in the way that she is singing;
Asters bend their heads to glory in globules white as snow,
And upon the hillsides purple mists are clinging
Like an incense lifting from the altars where they blow.

Cornfields lean toward her and pumpkins turn their faces
To catch the last, fierce rapture, the music of her feet;
And there comes a whisper from her secret places
As the orchards know her mood so radiant and sweet.

All the trees are harkening as the reaper passes,
For her eyes are gleaming with the dreams she knows,
And September whispers to the Summer
Promises of Spring's return when the Winter goes!
