THE HERITAGE

O, rich man's son! there is a toll
That with all others level stands;
Large charity doth never soil,
But only whitens soft white hands,
This is the best crop from thy lands!

A heritage, it seems to me,
Worth being rich to hold in fee.

O, poor man's son! scorn not thy state;
There is worse weariness than thine
In merely being rich and great;
Toil only gives the soul to shine,
And makes rest fragrant and benign;
A heritage, it seems to me,
Worth being poor to hold in fee.

Both, heirs to some six feet of sod,
Are equal in the earth at last;
Both, children of the same dear God
Prove title to your heirship vast
By record of a well-filled past;
A heritage, it seems to me,
Well worth a life to hold in fee.

—James Russell Lowell.

French Woman Famed for Skill as Cook

The famous Bleiler brevets, that followed in 1926. He was celebrated for the book called "The Physiology of Taste," wherewith he established the French tradition of fine cooking, says the Detroit News.

A great many people in Paris recently in his honor it was remarked that there was no woman guest. Some body has been explaining the omission on the ground that both she and he epicures and the great cooks have not been born.

That may be broadly true, but we believe that the "Mercury's" gaps being before the correspondents' columns was the most unparalleled page. This week there is a page full. Paris feature-general of the paper, whose features are the Home page and a wide celebrity. The Mercury must not neglect a letter and though this at first caused some comment among the people who subscribed to Homer Moore's achievement soon became famous.

According to an interview of the time, she proved to be called like a "potter's house" at the end of a week's work and she was enthusiastically boosted as "La Gordon Blue." Gordon Blue, though comically applied to men cooks in our day, was originally used of French women cooks, and was probably derived from the blue aprons which they wore in the kitchen.

The Way of a MAID with a MAN

By RAFAEL SABATINI

W.N.U. Service Copyright

The old man uttered a short cry. It ended on the half-sob from his set, quivering himself upon trembling arms, and, born of strength, he sank back in his chair.

Uncle's curse upon me who am the bearer of ill tidings" groaned Lucien Pantaloune savagely.

But the old man, recovering from his momentary collapse under the shock of that news, repeated the same six words, while Monna Fiavia stood immobile and rigid in grief.

"That is not yet all," Pantaloune continued, as if deliberately to torture himself and them. "I have just received a letter from Paris that the cup of misfortune is full to overflowing. Not that Hugh-Adrien is taken, together with his father, but that the Duke of Guise has declared himself openly their friend and protector. That is the end of all hope for us. We are ruined."

"Ruined, quickly," she corrected. "Ruined, but not dishonored."

"Then will he never rest, indeed," said Monna Fiavia bitterly.

"I pray so, Madonna," answered Pantaloune. "I pray so, for I do not think that he will ever rest while I live. I have served the Bourgs tyrant with his foul deeds, and he knows that I have served the Bourgs tyrant with his foul deeds, and he knows that I served him because I could not refuse to be reckoned as of the Ormini's family—I was born of their blood, and if I am taken I shall pay on an Paris gallows for the sins not my own that Master Orsini committed."

Monna Fiavia looked at him with a strange mixture of scorn and pity in her eyes. Her husband's cowardly abandonment that neither could repress, even in the face of the danger that was with a sudden and betraying eagerness.

"Its men not women who are to be feared," she said, and her bosom quickened with the scorn that she felt.

"It is the common talk," said that coward unmoved, "that Hugh-Adrien de Bourg is the ablest lieutenant the Huguenots have."

"Indeed!" Monna Fiavia began grave as if to reassume him, and then caution overcame her and she relapsed backed. Unwisely and suddenly Pantaloune had let slip the name of her fellow-lover, and the knowledge of his presence in Paris, and of his peril, had come to her with a shock that had left her unprepared to hide from him an avowal written. Only by the merest chance had he missed of his phrase. "I thank you sir, for that prayer."

But Pantaloune, accounting himself secure, and being in any case incapable of such suspicions were correct, and that Monna Fiavia was in love with Hugh-Adrien de Bourg, he would have been the last to believe it. Pantaloune had known Monna Fiavia since she was a child, and with his death with such equanimity had long since convinced that he was living. Such an occasion in any woman's life as the meeting of a man's presence at Fiavana could affect.

Wanting outwardly his mask of indifference, Pantaloune continued to pour out his heart relief to his kinsman that most Maffeo of this time, and that most Maffeo of this time, and that most Maffeo of this time, and
