CHAPTER I

Doctor Carpy's Story.

The mining camp of Sleepy Cat was rapidly filling up. Traders were building—the coming of the railroad was close at hand, the real estate offices were bustling, and the unquenchable optimism inspired by the only pure air in the world was everywhere in evidence.

With the rapidity common to such places the town had lost its earliest leniency and, imparted by the vagrant adventurer and the philosophic trader—men that penetrated the West without eat any definite clue, or a great amount of care, as to just where or how they should eventually bring up.

"Just when did this happen?" asked Wentworth, leaning forward in his chair, and dragging the chair forward with him—like a man quite ready to listen.

"The Fourth of July," repeated Carpy, surprised at the interruption. "You sure heard about it?"

"Forty kinds of stories!" exclaimed Wentworth, somewhat irritably. "Every cook driver between here and Medicine Bend has a different one. You say you saw it?"

"Just when did this happen?" asked Wentworth, leaning forward in his chair, and dragging the chair forward with him—like a man quite ready to listen.

"The Fourth of July," repeated Carpy, surprised at the interruption. "You sure heard about it?"

"Forty kinds of stories!" exclaimed Wentworth, somewhat irritably. "Every cook driver between here and Medicine Bend has a different one. You say you saw it?"

"Yes, sir. I was in it."

Doctor Carpy was sitting with Benjamin Wentworth in the morning sunshine on the narrow porch of the doctor's new hotel in Sleepy Cat.

"There was a suicide that night," he continued reminiscently. "—a girl down in the River quarter. They went for me. I couldn't do anything. She was lying on the bed on her back with her arms stretched out over her head. Somebody caught two of the old-fashioned wood spindles at the head of the bedstead with her hands and lay there with her eyes shut, moaning. While I was trying to find out what she'd taken, she went into a tetanic convulsion. I tried what antidotes I had, but it wasn't a bit of use; I saw right away I had been called too late.

"Of course, everybody smashed out. I didn't like it, myself, and I'm pretty thick-skinned. About all I could do was to wipe off her forehead and wipe the froth off her lips; and every time a spasm was coming on, she'd draw herself up with her legs quivering and cry out: 'God have mercy on my soul!'

"'God!' I says to myself sitting there bowing to her, and like as if I was talking to myself, 'You sure picked a hard doubt!'

"She heard me. She looked up, with the water dripping through the paint on her face. 'I picked a hard life! Oh, Doc,' she says, moaning: like, 'could you get me a pistol?'

"'H—l, girl,' I says, 'there ain't a priest this side Gunlock reservation, but no matter!' I says. 'Don't you worry too much. They ain't a-going to be too hard on you up there. Mary Magdalen's there—talk to her; you'll be a blamed sight better off there than you've been in this country.'

"Well, I wished you'd seen that girl's eyes when she began to go. They'd got pretty hard in Sleepy Cat; they turned all soft—kind of pleading—kind of like a youngster's looking to take a hard thrashing. After a while I managed to get her hands loose from the windlass—and there I set, like a dum fool, holding 'em myself—seemed like when she was going she wanted to keep hold of something. But I'll swear you'd never known her when I got her straightened out and laid her hands across her breast, and smoothed her spread up over her face—you wouldn't. I'll declare. Every-body stank clean out of sight, so I stayed—that's all a doctor's good for, anyway.

"Well, I walked down the blamed stairs doing some thinking. You remember that joint of Rusty Dorsey's? It's down close to the lower river bridge. The saloon is pretty big. Next to it is his barber shop, with a big arch opening into the Bateman. I stopped in the saloon to tell Barber my wife was dead—laying that some fine day I'd have a chance to hang him—and my dual partner of his, Al Sim. Then I took a drink—for got the meanest sick I've been Chanell Bluff and Salt Lake—and I was fair desperate.

"Being Fourth of July night, the place was pretty well filled up. About the first thing I noticed was Frank Sanger's gang of horse-thieves from Calabasas—they were packin' most of the noise. I knew they were in town that day and Barber's place was their hang-out. Frank Sanger and Buck Boyd were the brains of the outfit; they leased the ranching, and Sanger Gregg and a couple of cowboys from the Panhandle got rid of the horses. They were all handy with their guns and they'd got so bold they'd try to sell a man's own horses back to him if everybody was afraid of 'em. For a couple of years they'd been running the Spanish stinks to suit themselves.

"You remember old Dave Tracy from Thief River? Dave's been running a kind of one-horse freighting outfit between Thief River and Sleepy Cat. About six months ago Frank stole a team of mules from him, not thinking Dave would be much trouble. Dave is an old soldier. He's a gunslinger, too—his young nibbing partner of Thief River set him up in a big place here in Sleepy Cat—everything swell—up street, this side the hill—but Dave's a square gambler and he ain't afraid of nobody on earth.

"So next day Dave rides down to Sanger's dugout at Calabasas, sees his two mules in the corral, and starts for Thief River with 'em. About half way home Frank comes after him and Frank said they'd talk afterward—and pulled on him. He wasn't quick enough. Dave knocked him off his horse with a bullet through his shoulder; but, mistrusting for Dave, he rode away from Sanger without making a job of it. Sanger come to me. I told him I'd have to take his arm off—he said if I did he'd blow my head off; so away he went—and got well with his arm on; that's the way a doctor gets treated out here.

"Well, that was Tracy's start with the Calabasas bunch. After that they were laying for Dave. He knew it. He'd been up to see me in the spring about a young fellow—this mining partner of his—that he said was in the last stages of consumption. I gave him some medicine and told him to tell the fellow to drink plenty of good whisky. Dave said that was the trouble, he wouldn't drink any kind of whisky. I told Dave, Boyd and Sanger was in town with their gang, and he wanted him to keep away from Barber—that's all the good it did.

"So Fourth of July night, when I came down the stairs, I walked from the bar out through the archway into the barber shop to get shaved—would you believe it, the only barber shop we've got in town is down there in Barber's den?—and there was Tracy at the cigar stand paying for a hair-cut. And there in the first chair was a slim young fellow getting lathered up—there was only one barber on duty. I spoke to Tracy again, friendly like, and told him he lay low. But he wouldn't pay no attention to me. He just stepped out like a fellow twenty-five years old, into the saloon.

"I wasn't in at the start. But they said Tracy didn't see Frank Sanger. He walked up to one of the Panhandle men and asked where Sanger was. Sanger was right behind Tracy and he drew. He meant to shoot Tracy through the head, but Tracy saw the move in the eyes of the man he was talking to. He swung round quick and the bullet caught him in the neck and partly paralyzed him.

"I was standing talking to the barber. When the first shot was fired he was lathering the man in the chair. That man was out of the chair—well, you might say before the barber actually heard the shot, or before I heard it. The chair faced the saloon, and the man must've jumped six feet the first clip; he was through that opening into the barroom 'fore you could say 'Hippo!'

"Tracy pulled when he was falling or just pulled when he swung round; anyway, he plucked the trigger on Sanger from the floor and the blamed cartridge missed him. Tracy was up on his elbow full of lead, but he was going, and Sanger covered him again to finish him—and that shot was never fired. I ran into the doorway myself and there, three feet to my side of me, the man with the lather on his face was cutting in. He had his gun down on Sanger before Sanger could pull the trigger the second time, and he just naturally threw a bullet right across the room into Sanger's middle. More than that: before Sanger struck the floor, the slim fellow in the lather put another bullet through Sanger's head—if I hadn't seen it I couldn't've believed it. No man could ever told me two shots could be fired so close together from one gun.

"By this time the whole Calabasas bunch was shooting at Slim and there I was like a dummy, not three feet away from him; one bullet glanced off the lamb and nicked me right here in the rim." Doctor Carpy put the forefinger of his right hand dramatically into his right side to indicate the exact spot.

"Hang it, Wentworth," he resumed, "I'm sorry you didn't see it. There I was, also there was the —— in the lather dancing around like a happy-jack, shooting faster'n you could think and actually for a minute taking the fire of five men; and every time his gun went off the cuss knocked one of 'em down. It was too fast to watch—I just kind of saw 'em reeling around the temples and I watched the slim fellow, paralyzed. He was shooting with his right side turned to the bunch and his left arm straight out behind him, crooked up in the air—and dancing on his toes!"

Carpy laughed at the recollection. "I heard him shout something, but of course I couldn't get it. Dave Tracy got it, though. The slim fellow capered all the time nearer to Tracy, and Tracy, all the time, had been dragging himself toward the slim fellow. What he shouted was—as he told me afterward—'Your gun, Dave, your gun.' And, by hokey, when he'd emptied his own gun, he dropped it like a hot potato and grabbed Tracy's out of his hand. But there wasn't any need of another gun—four men were down—three of 'em never did get up. Sanger—well, he was sensational twice—once through the head and once through the head; it was against the law, for no man's life ought to be put in jeopardy twice for the same offense. Two of the bunch were on their feet—one man's gun was empty and his hands were up as high he broke his fingers trying to poke 'em through the ceiling; the other fellow was begging it for the door, and a shot from Tracy's gun fired by his partner nicked the yellow man in the leg—down he went.

"Wentworth, the room was so full of smoke I couldn't see the middle at all. And there was the slim fellow on one side—gun in hand and watching the room with eyes as sharp as a cat's—stooping and helping Dave with his left hand to crawl behind a table that was knocked over.

"I stepped forward to the end of the bar and put up my hand. 'Boys,' I says, 'I call this fight fit! Whoever you are, partner,' I calls out to the slim fellow, 'put up your gun. You've done the job and done it right.' Then the spectators that hadn't spectated crawled out from under the chairs and tables and began to peek in at the doors and windows. 'This has been a pretty fast celebration,' I says loud as I could. 'But I want to tell you all something. This place is closed for the night; finish up somewheres else. There's a young woman—well known in this town for the good was in her and more particular for that had was in her—lying dead in her own hand, upstairs—let us have peace!'"

Doctor Carpy had finished. He sat silent. Wentworth spoke. "It's a kind of curious thing," said he reflectively, "but I came up here to Sleepy Cat this time, Doc, to buy that freighting outfit of Tracy's—and I suppose now it can be bought right. However, after all that hard luck, I'm going to give the old man what his stuff is worth.

"But I never did expect," continued Wentworth, "to hear of Frank Sanger, George Osage and Rock Boyd getting down in a six-man fight. Was the slim fellow hit bad?"

"Wentworth, I was the only man hit on that side the house. The slim fellow wasn't so much as scratched—"

"Poor shooting."

"Well, yes—and no, Wentworth. Mind you, they were standing right in the center of the room—in the full light of a big lamp hanging from the middle of the ceiling. Slim was close to one side, and I noticed afterward, when he jumped from the doorway he jumped away from the bar side—not toward the dim corner. You see, there's another ceiling lamp in the barber shop that shines right through the arch, and outside that shine there's more or less shadow. The bar, of course, has its own light, so Slim just picked the shadow side of the archway and worked from that corner. I bet the leg of the thief that was hit running out. He told me he thought it was a good shooting from the corner. You see they'd got all ready for a good time with Dave, and must have been a surprise party for 'em.

"Then, they were bunched, too. They tried to scatter, but they had to shoot at the same time, and by guns, as fast as they scattered, down they went. I looked that room over when Wentworth, to figure it out—and if one of them Calabasas men hadn't all his socks, no matter, but the dribble of blood from the nicked lamb, he couldn't pick things better than the boy picked 'em.

"But I want to tell you, Mr. Slim was about petered when it was over. He helped Jim Madgin and me put Dave up to the hotel after Jim Madgin'd wrapped a towel around his head. Dave like a hawk till we got him to bed and fired up—acted as if he thought I was going to poison Dave myself; however, I made him sit down in a rocking-chair and stick to a quart of champagne—wouldn't drink nothing else—till he quietly had finished it. That steadied his nerves and he was all right again."

"What did you say the slim fellow's name was?" asked Wentworth. "Slim is he?"

"Why, it's the nick fellow Tracy come to see to get the medicine for—he's a gunsler—a sinking partner of Tracy's. Tracy staked him in a claim at Thief River, so when he struck it he staked Tracy here—and staked him right. I don't rightly know just who the young fellow is. He's got some good blood in him—somewhere. How do I know? Look at his nose and his eyes—just like you would at a horse—or at his hand—long and slim—I can sense pretty close to points in the latter put together. Some story behind him, maybe. He goes over by the name of Selwood—John Selwood—and treats with old Dave."

Little wreaths of smoke from Wentworth's cigar curled up from his fingers; he was looking into the sunshine from under the broad brim of his hat, out across the Spanish stinks. "I wonder," he said, after a pause, "whether he knows anything about freighting?"

"Freighting?" echoed Carpy. "Why, Tracy claimed that man's in the last stages of consumption—"

"We shouldn't need him very long," rejoined Wentworth, undisturbed. "The railroad will be in Sleepy Cat inside a year—"

"Glory to God!"

"Maybe," continued Wentworth, reflecting. "I can get this young fellow you're talking about to run our freighting business between Medicine Bend and Sleepy Cat. Why, Doc, they stand our mules, here on the West End, faster'n we can ship 'em in from St. Louis. It's something scandalous."

How Doctors Treat Colds and the Flu

To break up a cold overnight or to end short an attack of influenza, doctors usually prescribe a dose of salts, calomel or castor oil, combined with quinine. Pape's Cold Compound is a modern substitute for these old-fashioned remedies, without the objectionable features. One or two Colotabs at bedtime with a swallow of water is all the dose, no nausea nor the sickening taste. Next morning your cold is completely relieved, your system thoroughly purified and you are feeling fine with a keen appetite for breakfast. Eat what you please,—no diet.
