The inspection covered every phase of activity of the unit, including clerical work supervision and intelligence of the personnel. The official notice of the rating was received a few days ago by Captain Beers.

DISABLED VETERANS

Of World War Offered Free Service At Lexington Office

All veterans of the World War, who were wounded, gassed, injured, disabled or contracted any sickness, while in the Military or Naval service during the World War, whether overseas or not, and who desire prompt and valuable assistance in their compensation claims, or increase in what they are now receiving, can do so without charge from the State Headquarters of the Disabled American Veterans of the World War at Lexington, Kentucky.

The Disabled Veterans of Kentucky will hold a big convention in Lexington, on June 10th, 11th and 12th and on the night of the 10th all the candidates for Governor will address the Veterans from the same platform. On the 11th a number of army officials will be present in Lexington, by order of the War Department, to help entertain the Veterans and show the service they can secure.

A big banquet will be given on the night of the 11th in honor of the Disabled Veterans.

Friends of the Disabled Veterans have contributed the funds to entertain all the Disabled Veterans, who attend the State Convention.

All friends of the World War, should immediately write STATE HEADQUARTERS DISABLED VETERANS, LEXINGTON, KENTUCKY, giving names, addresses, claim number and kind of assistance needed and whether or not they will attend the Convention.

MILES OF THREAD IN CLOTHES

Statistics show that every inch of cloth contains about 75 threads running crosswise and the same number running across it, so that a square yard is composed of 1,800 threads, each a yard in length.

The average suit or costume needs four square yards of cloth, so that every man or woman wears something like four mile of wool.

Allowing two suits of clothes a year, we find that each of us uses 400 miles of wool in fifty years.

When we come to linen or cotton goods with 80 or 100 threads each way to the inch, the total length of threads becomes appalling. A single back-stitched may contain 2,400 stitches to the inches long, so that 1,000 yards of fine cotton are required to make it.

A shirt represents about three miles of thread.

To Eat, or Not to Eat

Pierre Trifleratt, who had been given wafers of chloride wrapped in rice paper, could not decide to eat them, says William Beebe in a recent naturalist in an article in Forum Magazine. "These wafers did not fall to bring forth sounds of delight. Instead, they were met at the same time they did not fail to provoke a great indecision in the minds of those who had fallen victim to their lure, however nobody could bring himself to destroy the beautiful smooth shining contour of his edible, in spite of the choice latitude within."

Ruth "Stuck" the Beans

Ruth, about five years old, was helping her uncle make the garden. Her task was to plant the beans which were of the climbing variety. She overheard her uncle say that too many of the beans should not be planted in a row, as they would be stuck. Down Ruthie went on her hands and knees and began to "stick" the beans into the ground very carefully, one at a time. No one noticed her until she was "sticking" the last bean. Then she spoke out. "Now you won't have to stick the beans, Uncle Hugh. I've done it for you."

Rosselas

"Rasselas" is the title of a philosophical story written by Dr. Samuel Johnson and published in 1759. Rasselas is the prince of Abyssinia, and in the rest of the royal family, he was confined in a private paradise. He escaped with his sister, Nekayah, and a poet named Imlac and started abroad to find out what rank of life was the most happy. After careful investigation, Rasselas found no lot without its drawbacks, and resolved to return to the "happy valley."

Solid Safety

A pullman porter was thrown from his car when the train was derailed and flew into fact through the door before he hit head first against a concrete platform. He got a dose nothing to his head when the conductor came running up.

"Great Scott, man," cried the conductor, "aren't you hurt?"

"No," said the porter, getting to his feet, "that concrete post must a broke my fall."

Too Much Competition

A little girl recovering from the measles, fell into a conversation with her mother as to the cause. As a joke, her mother said that the boisterous boys caused the measles by coming and straining the vocal cords.

"Yes but you see, mother child complained, "every time I start to talk, somebody else butts in and talks, too."

The Real Thing

It was her first view of a cotton plantation with the plants all in full bloom, a fine field of white cotton making her no end of wonderment. They rounded a curve and there was one big fat lazy. They attacked across the open, loading hideously. Platoons were shot down entire.

Lieutenant Robinson got into Beauvaches, with twenty men out of some hundred who started, threw the Boche out, and held it. They gained a footing in the rocky ledges at the edge of the Bois de Belleau, suffering much from what was believed to be a machine-gun nest at this point. They tried to leave it and go on, with a containing force to watch it; they found that the whole wood was a machine-gun nest.

Night descended over a tortured area of wheat and woodland, lit by flare and gun-flashes, dulled by machine-guns, and in two many places painful with crying of wounded who had lain all the day untended in a merciless sun. Here and there small combat patrols roamed over it in the dark. Sometimes parties of rattle parties groped back from forward positions over unknown trails. There were dog-fights and "scraps" in the wild alarms, and hysterical outbreaks of rifle fire. It was the same with the Boche; he knew the ground better, and he was determined to repossess it. His people filtered back through the American strong points for the marines did not hold a continuous line; their positions were connected by patrols and machine-guns laid for interlocking fire.

At the southern angle of Hill 142 the Forty-ninth company put out a listening post—one man down the slope a little way, to watch for visitors. In the night there was a tramping, a grunt, and one scream—"Boche!"—as the Boche fell himself into action—weary men, overspent, they fired into the dark and then they pieces wept hot. And after, they found the listening post fallen, hacked. And down on the hill a little boulder of new dead. Not all the rifle fire had gone astray.

Back in brigade, officers beat over maps and framed orders for a stronger attack on the Bois de Belleau at dawn. . . . Brigade was writing also to Division." . . . casualties severe . . . figures on which to base call for replacements will be submitted as soon as possible. . . ."

TO REDUCE SIZE

A reduction in the size of paper currency was approved last week by the treasury department, which said that the first of the new forms of money probably would be ready for circulation in about a year. The bills will be reduced about one and one-third inches in length and three-fourths of an inch in width, with a lowering in manufacturing costs of about $2,000,000 annually. Changes in designs in notes will not be material.

We ask plasterers, electricians, truckmen, carpenters, masonry-ion workers, linesmen, teamsters, painters and other trades workers to look over our assortments of work clothes. Such men know good workmanship, fit, durability and comfort, and we have pleased thousands.

The War as Close Range Described in a Remarkable Series by an Officer of the Marines —

Capt. John W. Thomason, Jr.

CHAPTER II

The Boche wasted Hill 142; he came, and the rifles broke him, and he came again. All his batteries were in action, and always his machine-guns scourged the place, but he could not make the Hill and retire. Gone he could understand; he knew all about bombs and auto-rifles and machine-guns and trench-mortars, but aimed, sustained rifle fire that coming from nowhere in particular and picks off men—it brought the war home to the individual and demoralized him.

Toward mid-day, this sixth of June, 1918, the condition around Hill 142 stabilized. A small action, fought by battalions over a limited area of no special importance, it gave the Boche something new to think out, and it may be that people who write his histories will date an era from it.

Between the American bullet bearers and the Red Cross men on both sides did their utmost for the wounded who were scattered through the wheat around the hill, and who now, under the torture of stiffening wounds and the hot sun, began to cry out. As the afternoon advanced, you heard pitiful voices, little and thin, across the fields: "Ach, Hilfmel, hilf mir! Brandigte! . . . Liebe Gott im brandigte!" . . . "First-aid—this way, First-aid, for the love of God!" . . .

Late in the afternoon a great upsour arose to the right. There was more artillery up now, more machine-guns, more of everything. The Third battalion of the Sixth marines and the Third battalion of the Fifth attacked the town called Bourescheres and the wood known as Bois de Belleau. They attacked across the open, losing hideously. Platoons were shot down entire.

Lieutenant Robinson got into Bourescheres, with twenty men out of some hundred who started, threw the Boche out, and held it. They gained a footing in the rocky ledges at the edge of the Bois de Belleau, suffering much from what was believed to be a machine-gun nest at this point. They tried to leave it and go on, with a containing force to watch it; they found that the whole wood was a machine-gun nest.

Night descended over a tortured area of wheat and woodland, lit by flare and gun-flashes, dulled by machine-guns, and in two many places painful with crying of wounded who had lain all the day untended in a merciless sun. Here and there small combat patrols roamed over it in the dark. Sometimes parties groped back from forward positions over unknown trails. There were dog-fights and "scraps" in the wild alarms, and hysterical outbreaks of rifle fire. It was the same with the Boche; he knew the ground better, and he was determined to repossess it. His people filtered back through the American strong points for the marines did not hold a continuous line; their positions were connected by patrols and machine-guns laid for interlocking fire.

At the southern angle of Hill 142 the Forty-ninth company put out a listening post—one man down the slope a little way, to watch for visitors. In the night there was a tramping, a grunt, and one scream—"Boche!"—as the Boche fell himself into action—weary men, overspent, they fired into the dark and then they pieces wept hot. And after, they found the listening post fallen, hacked. And down on the hill a little boulder of new dead. Not all the rifle fire had gone astray.

Back in brigade, officers beat over maps and framed orders for a stronger attack on the Bois de Belleau at dawn. . . . Brigade was writing also to Division." . . . casualties severe . . . figures on which to base call for replacements will be submitted as soon as possible. . . ."

At the crossroads beyond La Voisille Chatelle the replacements met the war.

Behind them, crammed somehow into weeks, were Quantico, the transport, Brest, a French troop train. Then there was the golden country around St. Aignan, the "Latin Quiso" of Americana.

The war was represented by demoulee non-coms, instructors in this and that. Bayonet drills—"Come on, you lemme hear you"—What do we wash our bay'nets in?—German blood."—and cut like this, and meant it, you dam' replacements! I'll swear, it's a shame to feed animals like you to the Germans—" Gas-mask drill—"Take more than five seconds, ye' your maw gets a gold star—Now!—the gas-alert position—O, for Gawd's sake, you guy, you wit' the two left feet—" "But sergeant, I find that I have a certain difficulty—" Sergeants also swear terribly. . . . There was every kind of drill, eight hours a day of it, and police work. . . .

Rumors of great battles in the north. Guns and sad civilians—they were guns and sad everywhere in France, that spring of 1918—talking in anxious groups after the town crier with his drum passed. Another troop train—maybe the same train that was carrying left alongside a train containing the wine ration for Provence. Chalons, the papers in which case are probably still accumulating. Chalons after that. The replacements debussed late of a June afternoon and went up a great wide road between nicely spaced poplars. They marched first in column of squads, then in column of files, platoons on opposite sides of the empty road. At the crest of a slope the column stopped. You could see, looking down the long road, to north and east, curious shapes—"Look like a elephant's head, boys on, wit' his ears out, don't they, sergeant?"—"Be still there!" from the nonest officer in charge: "We'll stop here, sir. Boche sausages ponderous—they're what a few rattling out country. Will wait till dark."

The detachment was glad to fall out, off the road. The sun set after a while, and the day drowned into the long twilight. Presently the sergeant said: "We can move now, sir." The replacements moved, making no conversation.

A little country road led them off the highway. They passed a shattered farmhouse where a few soldiers lounged in the dusk. "Regimental, Sir. Gets shelled a lot. No, sir, they don't expect you to report. Somewhere on the road is most you. . . . "A little group of officers rose out of the ditch, yawning. They looked slack and tired. "Replacement colonial? You in charge? You—assigned men made back in Brigade. You'll go too, Henry: Your battalion gets a hundred and seven with five officers. Take 'em off the head of the column—tell Major Turrill—"

The detachment followed the officer called Henry, who set what they considered an immoderate pace. He passed the word: "Don't bunch up; if a plane comes over low, don't look up at Boche can see your faces; no smokin', an' don't talk—"

They went through a zap in a ruined wall, and over another crossroads. "Fall out here, an' form column o' fours." Then your stuff under the hedge. Take one blanket. Come on!—single file, an' don't bunch up!—" The replacements formed column o' fours, remembering Parris Island and Quantico. "Smarter, by God, now don't keep those!" Two goods boxes sat close together, and the men filed between them. One box had dried into a heap of old clothes. Something took the kneecap off the head long above were and they found themselves things and noted that the wood was very near, and that the German shells were passing high and broke low in the valley where the transport companies were waiting. His own artillery appeared to have lifted its range; the sound of the shells farther in—to the depths of the wood.

The air stopped and crackled all around. The sergeant beside the lieutenant stopped, looked at him with a frozen, foolish smile, and crumpled
