Hide Must Be Tanned

The American Chemical society says that if left untanned a hide, like the meat, decays. In the untanned state the fibers of the hide are glued or matted together. When tanned the strings or fibers are "individualized" so that they move separately without tearing apart. This process also swells or thickens the skin.

India's Metropolis

The Hindu of "Calcutta" is "Kali ghatta." "Kali" is the name of one in Hindu goddess to whose a temple has been erected in Calcutta. "Ghatta" in the Hindu for "shed," or "landing place." "Kalighatta" means "temple of Kali, landing place of Kali."

Acquired Needs

Ancient Adornments

Closely related to necklaces of precious stones are the choking and red bits of gold which appear to have been used by the Hebrews for ornaments, as well as official distinction (such as they are, to a certain extent, today). Ancient Persians were extremely fond of gold ornaments and conspicuous among the curious ob jects were chains.

Dumonds in America

Although Arkansas is the only place in which real diamonds are found in the rough in America, the United States is credited with having 10 percent cutting of the diamonds in its famous jewelry hours.

Mohammedan Ban on Silk

Silk is considered unclean by the Mohammedans because it is the product of a worm.

Fled From Painted Baboon

A blue baboon has stopped the ruler of wild animals in Kenya, South Africa, according to latest reports. Elephants, hippopotami, hunting and lions that have done much damage to villages have been completely routed by the "strange creature," which consisted of a baboon that was captured, shaved and painted a bright blue before he was released to try his job his fellows, who fled at his appearance.

Victory for Locusts

The air force base at Kowel, Africa, established to defend the city against desert Wahabi raiders, recently engaged a new enemy. When clouds of locusts threatened to do great damage, airplanes went up to try to scatter them. Some of the machines were forced down owing to the locusts blocking the radiators.

The Spaniard nodded. "Yes. I'm sorry for the delay. You look a bit played out. What about a drink?" Before she could refuse he had produced from the outer room a bottle and two glasses. "I can't have rifle falsiting on the way," he said. "This will do you good." Perhaps his voice was less metallic and rather than usual. There was a note in it which was like a cold douche on Rosemary's impatience. It steadied her and she was alert as she took the glass and put her lips to it. The taste was un pleasant.

"What is it?" she asked with a grimace.

"Our local poison, Sephir. It won't do you any harm." His voice sounded muffled and he seemed to be very busy with a refractory cork.

Suspicion flashed across Rosemary's portion. "I'd rather have water," she said. "Do get me some," and made a pretense of drinking.

Juan left the room without comment and the girl watched, the glass in her hand, vainly searching a receptacle. She had just emptied the stuff behind the cushions when Mertengo returned. Guiltily she faced him, a flush burning so deeply that it was like a hand throttling her.

"It was not necessary," said the Spaniard. "You need not have been afraid." He stood in the doorway looking at her and the girl knew at once that the mask was gone. In face of a moment's danger her poise quieted.

"It is very late, we must start," she said, and was pleased at the uncompromising coldness of her tone.

"Not yet," said Juan. "I want to talk to you!" He closed the door, locked it as if he would fix he back it, but there was no keyhole. "We can talk on the way."

"It is too late to go tonight. The dawn would catch us before we were out of sight. You must wait here till tomorrow and we will start as soon as it is dark." He kept his hands in his pockets, but his eyes were hot. They pestered her, stripping her of her loose-wound barracan. Rosemary understood and anger blazed in her. "Did you ever mean to help us?" she flung at him.

A smile crept into every deep grooved line in the face before her "I did. I do. But my price"

For a moment the girl was deceived. "What talk about that now? You know I have nothing with me." With a feel of impatience she clenched her hands "If it's money you want, you can have as much as you like when I get to Fez. Surely you're not going to waste time for gabbling."

"Dona mia, I would have left that kind of reward to your generosity— it's another sort I'm after."

Rosemary was silent. A little sickness crept up her. She was a bit uncertain of her knees, but she held herself that she was not in the least afraid.

"Sit down for a minute." Mertengo politely to his words, and without conscious volition the girl found herself in a corner, huddled into the smallest possible compass. The man did not move or change his attitude. "Freedom is worth a good deal to you isn't it?" he asked. "I'll give you my word you shall go down to Fez."

"Your word," repeated Rosemary.

Juan ignored her scorn. "You can't afford to take it like that," he said "Nobody knows where you are. I can do what I like with you."

Mechanically the girl tucked a fold of her barracan over her feet. She felt she must cover every inch of her sandal caught in her native dress and before she could recover she was in his arms.

"Dios, how I've wanted you!" His lips were on her throat as she strained away.

"Let me go!"

"Not yet" laughed the Spaniard, tightening his hold. Something clicked in the girl's brain. The shuffling of their feet, Mertengo's breathing, the sudden rip of her barracan were confused with another sound, the rush of footsteps, voices, but she didn't know if they were outside or in her own head. A scream tore through her throat. Why, it was easy! She wasn't so dumb—somebody was outside. She screamed again and again.

A door burst open and there was a medley of voices in the outer room. Mertengo loosed his hold as men entered in upon them. Rosemary, freed by his astonishment, ran down the hanging open, saw Westwyn hurl himself at the Spaniard. She saw Juan go off the couch by the impact of their bodies. Huddled on the floor, she shut her eyes, while the room became a whirlwind of struggling figures. A horrible, guttural scream broke into her consciousness. "You're strangling him," said a voice. "It's murder, now. Drop It!" The girl's lids were forced up. Curiosity and panic held her gaze on the fight. Heinz and Pete were trying to pull Mertengo off something crumpled and gulping among the bed steps. With a terrific heave they dragged off the aggressor, shaking him as they might have done a terrier. Hassan Biffa were looking through the doorway. Rosemary recognized the young Mountain. Then something she looked at the figure on the couch slowly Mertengo pulled himself to his feet. "You'll pay for this," he said thickly. Westwyn nodded toward Rosemary, still on the floor. "Take her back to the guest house, Heinz," he ordered. "Are you all right, Miss Crofton, not hurt?" Mertengo fumbled against the table. A riding whip was on it, and in a second the Spaniard had seized it and struck Westwyn across the face. "I'll pay for this, you love, three to one, you peasant, but I'll steal you and give you like to some."

There was an instant of silliness in the room. Then half a dozen voices broke out. The Riffs seized Mertengo. Heinz hustled Rosemary out of the door. "You've got to chuck come with me," he said, and did not refus his hold even when they were on the path. The girl dragged back. "What will happen? What will they do?" she repeated. "There will be a duel," retorted the German. "One of those fool blind duels that the Riffs are so fond of."

Refusing to answer any more questions, he hurried her down the steep track. "If you want to help us," he told her as they reached the guest house, "don't move outside this place." He had started up the hillside before she had time to protest. "What is it?" whispered Zarifa at her elbow. "I saw the Kaid running with men behind him. What has happened? Where is going to be a duel," said Rosemary, dully. "Zarifa, what is a blind duel?" But the Riff woman was clinging to her arm. "What do you mean? Who is going to fight? Not the Effet? Yes, I'm afraid so. Mertengo struck him."

"Alee!" wailed Zarifa. "It will be murder. The Spaniard is as cracked as a witch's stick!" She disappeared into the darkness, horsefooted, her barracan dragging behind her.

Half an hour later a group of men were gathered in Mesteblia's house. The young headman, his dignity like a mantle on his shoulders, was seated on a carpet. On either side of him stood Westwyn and Mertengo, the German and half a dozen Riffs were clustered opposite.

"You are willing to fight in our way, Sidi?" asked the host, looking anxiously at the Englishman. He saw disturbed that a matter of such importance must be decided during his father's absence. The honor of the village was in his hands, but though any form of warfare appealed to his sporting spirit he knew that he ought not to endanger the Kaid. That man's life was worth more to Abd-el Krim than half a dozen tribes, yet Mesteblia had been brought up in the Riff tradition. The challenged man must fight. It was in the hands of Allah, he decided. Heaven would decide the issue.

"I will fight in any fool way you like," returned Westwyn impatiently. He, too, was thinking of Abd-el Krim, of his unfinished work. It—a the girl! W... a always get themselves into messes. Better get the thing over quickly as possible. Pity he hadn't killed the fellow up there. Mesteblia signaled to a servant and the youth, black, narrow-eyed, with a scar across his lip, brought two pistols. They were the long-barreled native weapon, inlaid with ivory and silver.

"They are twins," said the young chief. "One only will be loaded. You, Sidi, can decide who chooses."

The Englishman shrugged indifferent shoulders.

"I'll leave that bit of flummery to Mertengo," he said.

"As you will. The pistols will remain in my charge tonight. When the sun rises we will go up the hill at a signal you will both fire, but only one of you will have an effective weapon."

"It's murderer," broke in Heinz "The sultan will have your head for this. If the Kaid is killed the Spaniard will be in the Riff within a month. You are sparrows without him."

He glared at Mertengo, who responded gravely. "If a truck. It is their not our lives will go with the Kaid's, but this is a custom. The Spaniard has been beside us in battle He can claim this duel. Who am I to deny It in the face of our tradition? Our safety is in the hands of Allah."

"It is settled," said Westwyn. "I'm going to get an hour or two of sleep."

He took courteous leave of Mesnabbia, ostentatious in preoccupied fashion of a curious glance from the servant who held the pistols. When he was outside he remembered that he

Telephone service, a public trust

THE widespread ownership of the Bell Telephone System places an obligation on its management to guard the savings of its hundreds of thousands of stockholders.

Its responsibility for so large a part of the country's telephone service imposes an obligation that the service shall always be adequate, dependable and satisfactory to the user.

The only sound policy that will meet these obligations is to continue to furnish the best possible service at the lowest cott consistent with financial safety.

There is then in the Bell System no incentive to earn speculative or large profits. Earnings must be sufficient to assure the best possible service and the financial integrity of the business. Anything in excess of these requirements goes toward extending the service or keeping down the rates.

This is fundamental in the policy of the cbtapany.

The Bell System's ideal is the same as that of the public it serves—the mott telephone service and the best, at the leatt cott to the user. It accepts its responsibility for a nation-wide telephone service as a public trutt.

$1,000 REWARD OFFERED FOR LOUISVILLE WOMAN

Rewards totaling $1,000 have been offered by the Courier-Journal and Louisville Times for information leading to the discovery of Mrs. Ella McDowell Rogers, young widow, who disappeared mysteriously from her apartment in Louisville on October 7. Police made a search of Cherokee park and dragged the pond in a hope of finding the body.

Phillip Haynes, negro janitor at the apartment house where Mrs. Rogers resided at the time of her disappearance, was arrested in connection with the case and has told conflicting stories.

Hal Harned, Dawson Springs banker, who was the last person known to have been with Mrs. Rogers the night before her disappearance, was questioned by police but gave a satisfactory explanation of his whereabouts.

FANCY TOBACCO SOLD AT 35 CENTS PER POUND

(Mt. Olivet Tribune-Democrat)

Several sales of tobacco have been made in this county, at prices ranging from 25½ to 36c, but the record sale was made Wednesday by R. D. Wells, who sold two crops, one grown on his own lands on Piqua Pike and one grown on the lands of Mrs. Laura Thompsett on Bee Lick Road, near town, the two crops totaling. It is estimated, 9,000 pounds, at the record price, so far, of 35c. Mr. Wells is an expert tobacco grower and as a rule gets good prices. C. H. Newman and C. D. Asbury were purchasers of the two crops he has just sold.

BANKER NABBED AFTER 15 YEARS

Fourteen years ago a chain of 107 small Georgia banks crashed; John L. Walker, of Rogetta, Ga., president of them all, had disappeared. The wife of an Athens, Ga., jeweler dropped from sight simultaneously. State indictments were obtained five years ago.

Friday night Mr. Walker was en route from New York in custody of agents of the United States Department of Justice to face charges in the federal court that he converted bank funds to his own use as collateral for making loans.

Much has happened in fourteen years. Walker was traced to the Orient and back to the United States. He was arrested once at San Antonio, Texas, but the governor of that state refused to honor extradition papers in the absence of federal warrants there was no prosecution.

The mission board of the North Georgia conference, Methodist Episcopal church, has complained him as its treasurer. Mrs. Walker obtained a divorce naming the jeweler's wife and the jeweler also obtained a divorce. Most of the banks weathered the storm several years. But Friday John D. Walker was en route to Macon,—after fourteen years.

PRESIDENTS' PROFESSIONS

A list of the thirty presidents of the United States reveals that 21 were lawyers, four statesmen, two planters, two soldiers and fine a publisher While history bears record that several of our presidents were soldiers, it appears that neither Washington, William Henry Harrison, or President Pierce cared for the soldier title when assuming the presidency, both Washington and Harrison penning "planter" after their names and Pierce, subscribing himself as a lawyer.

Mrs. Ella Callon, of Seattle, refused to prosecute her husband who deserted her 16 years ago to marry another woman and took him home from court.

PROTECTION AGAINST RABBIT FEVER

The hunting season is with us and while we enjoy and benefit by the outdoor exercise obtained care must be taken not to contract the disease known as Rabbit fever or tularemia. The public is again reminded that the danger of contracting the disease is from the blood or organs handled in dressing, gutting or cutting up the rabbit. Dr. A. T. McCormack, State Health Officer, urges hunters, house wives, and market men to observe the precautions that will prevent this disease. Dr. McCormack calls attention to the necessity of following these simple means of prevention.

Keep your bare hands out of a wild rabbit. Rubber gloves afford practically complete protection to those who must dress wild rabbits.

Rabbit meat will be just as safe and just as wholesome as it ever has been provided the rabbit meat is thoroughly cooked before eating and provided the raw meat is not promiscuously and carelessly handled, and with the additional and immediate provision that the person dressing the rabbit, either for domestic use or the market, should be exceedingly careful in handling the carcass.

Use rubber gloves for dressing or cutting up rabbits in the home, or the market.

COAL PRODUCTION INCREASES IN HARLAN COAL FIELDS

Coal production in the Harlan county district has been increasing speedily during the last three months, Raine the Enterprise, of Harlan, October issue, a total of 1,275,000 tons produced, or a loading record of 25,500 coal cars, 372,300 tons being mined during the last week in the month. 50,475 tons, or a leading increase of October's gain over September was 4,314 cars. The Harlan county fields annual production during August, September and October is estimated at 1,218,425 tons.

VIOLINIST NEXT IN ARTIST SERIES

With the Schipa concert still lingering as a most pleasant memory, music lovers of Lexington and Central Kentucky are looking forward to the second concert of the artist series which will be given by Frances Macmillen, violinist, Tuesday 4 at 8:15 o'clock at the Woodland Auditorium. He will be assisted by Ralph Angell at the piano. "The master of the violin today." "A concert of rare beauty." "The applause was nothing short of tumultuous." Few wielders of the bow have so ardent a following" are some of the expressions from the New York critics concert this artist.

Tickets for the concert are $1.00, $1.50, $2.00 and $2.50 and are on sale at the Lexington College of Music at which Miss Anna Chandler Goff is director.

TO MOVE BETHEL M. E. CHURCH TO NEW SITE

The official board and membership of the Mt. Pleasant Methodist Episcopal Church, South, near Beulgh, have announced that contracts have been let to wreck and move the old church from its present site to a point on the Owingsville and Bethel Turnpike, a mile and one-half from its present location. A modern structure will be built on the present site, which is more convenient and offers more advantages, it was announced.

The Mt. Pleasant Methodist Church is a famous church in this section of the State. It is the second church in Bath County, Springfield Presbyterian Church being the oldest. It was organized and built in 1810, one year before Bath county was created. Noted ministers of Kentucky Methodism have been pastors and preached in the church. The first church erected was a log building, which was destroyed by fire in 1839. The building now being moved was built in the year 1850.

W. C. T. U. WILL CONTINUE OPPOSITION TO SMOKING

The national W. C. T. U. in convention at Seattle, passed a resolution pledging itself to continue its opposition to the tobacco habit.

A feature of the educational campaign, to be conducted against tobacco habit will be the display of a poster depicting a young mother with a baby in her arms and a cigarette in her hand and around her head a halo of tobacco smoke. The title of this picture would be: "Do we want that kind of halo around American motherhood?"

BOYS PREPARED FOR "MART OF INDUSTRY"

More than 7,000 boys are now receiving instruction in home economics in 42 States, according to a statement issued by the R. B. Department of the Interior through its Bureau of Education. "A year in home economics is required of boys in the western school before they can graduate, it was stated. "It is now recognized," the statements reads, "that boys are called upon daily to select food either at home, in the school, or in restaurants; often to buy clothing; and later in their lives to build, purchase or rent a home and to be co-partners in the rearing of a family. . . . A proper understanding of the problems of those homes promises to be of constant practical value to them after they become men and acquire families."

Lightning struck her vanity case while Miss Geneva Mayer, 17, Newport, Ky., was powdering her nose, but she was not injured.
