In the remaining fight he could see men crawling in like opposite field, the steady flash of rifle fire from behind the hedge, and the pretty blunt shape of an airplane that ducked and swooped and tipped over the line of hedge. The barrage had stopped, except the shells that were bursting between the road and the farmhouse down to the south.

Again Eadie seized the handles of the support and, dragging the gun behind him, he got it to the edge of the station and swung it again toward the enemy. A new attack had just swept out of the gulch and, as the wave headed it, was flying low and raining down bullets upon the Americans, the tracers glinting like sparks from a Roman candle. Eadie could hear their voices calling. The American fire seemed to lessen, there was a final spitting, and the ragged crash of a volley. The airplane jumped as does a wild foal that receives a charge of shot, then climbing, turned suddenly sideways and fell swiftly to earth. Crash! The gulp and roar of an explosion, and the wreckage was in flames.

"Let's go!" cried Eadie. Beyond the flames of the burning plane he could see a wave of men coming up the east face of the hill and on the wave he swung his gun. It rattled for several seconds. Silence. Eadie pressed the breech to free the jam, and pressed harder upon the thumb piece. The breech locked closely at the breech. The ammunition belt had run through. "That's simple," he muttered. He crawled over to the hole, gathered up three boxes of ammunition, and then returned. The plane blazed now a pillar of fire from wings to upended tail and by its light Eadie could see that there was still another belt in the box by the gun. He seized the end of this and inserted it in the breech. The tongue went through easily and the first bullet clicked into the chamber. Eadie then trained down on the enemy and pushed the thumb piece. The gun remained quiet.

"Ah, there's a d—d lever you have to pull!" he cried. The light from the plane had rapidly died out and he seemed to Eadie that it was much farther than before. . . . He felt both sides of the breech, he got up from the ground and inspected carefully with his eyes, but no lever could he see. Across the road the fight raged and men shouted in English to "Hold 'em" or "Look out for your end!" There was also considerable firing in German, probably the officers urging on their men. Eadie in the darkness fumbled with the gun, cursed, raved, pulled the belt and inserted it again, pressed the thumb piece until his arms ached and was about to abandon the gun when he discovered a new lever on the right side that moved. He shoved it down all the way and allowed it to come back. The machinery clicked.

"That's it!" cried Eadie, but the gun remained silent. Eadie rested his head on his hands and tried to think calmly. What sign could be left that the thing would not work. He was tempted to hurl it all over the bank and into the road. Yet the gun, even in that ditch had need of him, the gun must be loaded some way, and if he tried again slowly, he must discover the method.

"Now suppose I pull the belt and shove that lever at the same time! He tried to do this, but the weight of the lever slipped from his hand and snapped violently back as he pulled on the belt. The mechanism clanked ear-splittingly, but the belt jumped forward! "By G—d!" cried the sergeant. This time when he pulled the belt he deliberately let go the lever. Again the gun clicked and the belt jumped. Without daring to hope, Eadie tried pressing the thumb piece. The gun barked joyously.

"Letter go!" shrieked Eadie. He settled his elbows and swung the gun into a dark mass in the opposite field that melted away before the blast. He threw a belt down beside him for the eastern field by the wreckage of the plane and then, pulling down on the handles, tried a little indirect fire on the gulch. He kept the gun going, pausing now and then to rest his thumbs. He understood loading now and the second belt he inserted with ease. The enemy he expected every minute would pop him a shell, but he was unmolested. Perhaps the Germans would think it was their own gun, firing on the Americans, and if they felt the effects of it in their ranks, they would attribute it to the rifle fire from the bridge.

The Germans changed their tactics. They retired to the gulch and shelled both bridge and main road for an hour or two. They drenched the place with gas, they watered it with machine gun fire. They wanted badly to get by a living wedge down the gulch and separate the two divisions. Some flanks touched there, but this force of Americans prevented it. Some say did not know that there were only about a hundred starving men holding them up. And then, the darkness at that time did not have the determination and eagerness in attack that they displayed earlier in the war. Nevertheless, after the bombardment they launched three simultaneous attacks. Eadie broke up the one that came up the main road from the gulch almost before it started. Then he turned the gun across the road. It was the blackened pile of junk that had been an enemy airplane. Jake was over there, and Lieutenant Conner, who did not now much about being an officer, at least knew how to die like one. Eadie guessed that the American had made a general advance at first contact. His watch now told him it was eight o'clock. The survivors of the wreckage of the section road had probably gone on with the advance, or else had been relieved and sent to the rear.

"I'm going to be relieved, too," decided Eadie.

If the ambulance could come up that road from the south then he could get out that way, decided the sergeant. He went down into the gulch, and barking at the dead Germans there, and so up the opposite slope. Here the road joined another and Eadie took the south fork. Immediately he met infantry marching in column of a whole brigade, he thought, until he noticed the fresh uniforms, the shaven faces, and the brand new equipment. Reinforcements, these men were, going up to fill up the depleted ranks of some division. No, that wasn't it, because reinforcements would be marching in columns so near the front. This must be a fresh division, just coming in to see what it could do.

"There goes my relief right now. "To Eadie's" the men answered him in a cheer.

Eadie was moved to laugh hoarsely. "There's bad boys up there in the woods that'll murder you, and catches all over mud," he called. "That Berlin bunch is kinda rowdy."

A column of artillery, some Three Hundred and Seventies, decided that Eadie had never heard of followed the infantry, and batteries of artillery. In the open and with the sergeant at camouflage spat flame and shells at the enemy. Eadie felt as if time ranks wadded across, looking like a flock of ducks in search of a pond.

A two-wheeled cart appeared around a turn and Eadie hobbled toward it. This cart had a tank on it and was used for carrying drinking water. The approaching thing about it was that it had upon its side the words, "Battery A," and the man that drove it was one Cracker Coombs, a man well known to Eadie.

"Hey!" called the sergeant, standing up.

"Hyuh, sahgunt," replied Cracker, reining up. "Wanta ride? Climb on."

Eadie regarded gladly enough. "Where's the battery?" he asked, as Cracker climbed into the forward once more.

"Down the road a piece," replied the driver. "It's a h—l of a long ways to come fo watuh three an' fo' times a day. Where yuh been at, sahgunt, sightin'?"

"I'll say," agreed Eadie. "I've had enough of it for a while. The battery been doing anything?"

"Ain't tired yuh any a shot yet. We had two showdown inspections and a church parade. It was a good one, too, only two o them boche planes flew ovuh an' broke it up."

"That's a h—l of a way to fight a war," remarked Eadie. "How come? Don't they ever get at it somewhere else?"

"I ain't stindyin' about that a-tall, said the driver. "I got to tote watuh whether they fights or not, I learned he was to hook up some Liberties after they took foot in hand an' done gone be no cuss words to me, sahgunt."

"Dum!" said Eadie, "well, maybe I'll get a chance to walk back and didn't hear an American shell for two or three days. How's the outfit feelin' now?"

"Right slim!" said the driver.

In a few minutes the cart pulled off the road and Eadie was home. From the best of the carts were still in the battalion strung out along a field, the guns of the three batteries in position, behind them piles of shells and the gunners sitting idly around in shirt sleeves smoking.

A long line of harnessed limbers stood ready, while the horses fed in rear of trees. Men wandered aimlessly about, some shaved or cleaned the mud from their clothing, others drew themselves dugouts, some slept. Behind the lines of trucks was a pile of helmets, rifles and miscellaneous equipment, with here and there a patch of white cloth. Signs such as these pointed to the presence of a dressing station in the vicinity, and that pile of arms contained the equipment and weapons taken from the wounded.

"Here we are," cried Eadie, leaping down. The water cart always stops here for the kitchen, that brought Eadie immediately to the place he sought.

"How's chances on chow?" cried the sergeant.

"Ain't got much ch—w," said the driver, grinning. "Grub and the news sergeant are off to see can they find a ration dump to steal a little for supper. We just got through with breakfast an' I put on everything I had."

"D—n and d—d!" cried Eadie. "I haven't set my teeth into food for two days!" The guns were still thundering sadly at each other when the first of the reinforcements got a chance at a new job for you. Maybe he's going to need you, you'll get something to eat. There's a detail goin'. Go see him. You better shave first, though, and wash up a little bit."

"That's right," said the cook. "You go shave and wash up an' when you come back I'll have somethin' for you to scoff."

"Where's the liaison detail hang out?" asked Eadie.

"Both," replied the first sergeant. "They got an old Jerry dugout up on the hillside."

Eadie went in the indicated direction, after filling his canteen at the water cart. The dugout he found easily, for Baldy was in the doorway.

"Well, I'm d—d!" exclaimed Baldy. "Yuh look like yuh been in a war."

"Well, I haven't," said Eadie, "I've been snipe hunting. How's everything?"

"Ah, I know it was you!" cried Snyder, and Short Mack poked his
