DINSMORE'S FOLLY

to those early days) was that the place was mine—my very own. Uncle Jo Dinsmore had willed it onto me in his will and given me the preference to discover what he had done to me myself it was too late to stop that. Moreover, he had added a proviso that if I should neither sell nor mortgage the place until I was twenty-one (that is to say, not for two years more), that I should see that it was always occupied, at least by a caretaker, and that I should live in it for at least four weeks in every year. He also left a sum of money in trust for my benefit, in which he requested that I should keep "Dandy" Perkins on as gardener or caretaker as long as he wanted to stay. "Perkins has not been very generous to deal with—my wife ran away," he wrote. "But he has been a faithful servant to me for many years, and I should not like him to be turned out. Moreover, he hopes and believes that some day the woman will come back to him at Dinsmore Folly, and I feel that he would be cruel to destroy this hope by driving him away."

Of course I had been to Dinsmore often to see Uncle Josephus, who was nice enough to make me almost forget the awful name by which he loved; and of course I knew Perkins as well as anyone could know the old fool's servant—for until I read grandpa's note I had never known that Perkins was his name—but I suppose everybody considered that I knew it, too, and so I had, in fact, scarcely remembered that he had a wife at all. I suppose I had seen her, but I had never noticed her particularly. She looked more Irish than Perkins, too, for which reason I had invented the story and he had never undeceived me by his own account. But was I sorry? Not a bit. I was only sorry that I had been such a fool as to have let myself be bamboozled by Uncle Jo's cock-and-bull story about
