There are many reasons for the ease of steering the new Ford

THE new Ford is exceptionally easy to steer because of the well-proportioned weight of the car, the steel-spoke wheels, the co-ordinated design of springs and shock absorbers, the size and design of the steering wheel, and the simple mechanical construction of the steering gear.

The Ford steering gear is of the worm and sector type used on high-priced cars and is three-quarter irreversible.

In simple, non-technical language, this means that the car responds easily and quickly to the steering wheel, yet there is no danger of the wheel being jerked from the hands of the driver by ruts or bumps in the road. A light touch guides the car, yet you always have that necessary feel of the road so essential to good driving.

Strength of materials and careful workmanship give unusual stability to the Ford steering gear and housing.

The steering worm, for instance, is splined to the steering worm shaft and is stronger, of course, than if a single key were used to hold the shaft and worm together. The steering worm sector is forged and machined in the same piece with its shaft.

The housing of the steering gear mechanism is made of three steel forgings, electrically welded together. This housing is then electrically welded to the steering column. Such a one-piece steel unit is naturally much sturdier than if several parts were used and bolted or riveted together.

Throughout, the new Ford steering mechanism is so simple in design and so carefully made that it requires practically no attention.

The only thing for you to do is to have the front steering spindles, spindle connecting rods, and drag link lubricated every 500 miles and the steering gear lubricated every 2000 miles.

For this work, you will find it best to consult the Ford dealer. He has been specially trained and equipped to help you get the greatest possible use from your car over the longest period of time at a minimum of trouble and expense.

"What the Gray House Hid"

Adolf Smucker was always earlier at the office than the other employees. It gained him a reputation for punctuality, and enabled him to learn much of the firm's business that would otherwise be kept from him.

He was nervous on this particular morning. He had gone home the night before, and had told his family of all the daring and splendid things he had said and done. Mrs. Smucker, usually so admiring and reassuring, had remarked:

"Dolf, you've fired yourself. You might have waited till the two girls was out of school."

Smucker's father had listened reprovingly to the account of the planked steak.

"Veal beer?" he said many times. "Not in this life shall I taste real beer again!"

"Nor in the life to come," said his daughter-in-law. "Turn your thought from your sinful appetites." She looked at the clock. "It's time you went to the docks."

Assuredly Adolf Smucker was unhappy. He was filling letters Indus triously when Hanby sent for him.

"No," said Hanby, as Adolf un shorted his newly pointed pen. "I'm not giving you any letters today. I'm getting rid of you. The rodder will pay you a month's salary."

The Adam's apple tried to burst its bounds.

"I'm sure I've worked long and faithfully for you, Mr. Hanby," Smucker cried. "I don't deserve this."

"You don't," returned Hanby. "Two weeks' salary would be quite sufficient. Listen to me, Smucker. You've never been either faithful or efficient. God knows why I didn't fire you years ago. I suppose those hard luck stories you used to spring when ever you were in danger saved you. You told me less than a month ago the same old yarn about paying in stallments on your home and looking after an old father. Don't interrupt! Your home was paid for three years ago, and your old father is right well and sound back near where you live. Your three elder children have gone to work and left a crowd at home. Probably you are comfortably fixed."

Smucker raised his voice.

"Mr. Hanby, I won't be fired with out just cause!"

"You've had cause been honest," continued Hanby. "Three or four petty cash irregularities that can be gone into if you wish. And certain losses of postage stamps. If you are wise, you won't provoke me any longer."

Smucker withdrew. So they had found out about him! What a trick for a rich man like Hanby, to be watching when an old employee used an office stamp for his private correspondence!

When he was much excited, there were holes in Mr. Smucker's head as

WALK ON LEFT SIDE OF ROAD

Few people walk on the left side of the road although this advice is given by all road departments, automobile clubs, etc. The reason it is more dangerous to walk on the right side of the road is that when two cars are about to pass each other near a pedestrian, the car coming up behind him is forced to the right side of the road and may strike the walker without his observing the car. If he walks on the left side of the road then the car on his side of the road is in front of him and he will step aside far enough to avoid being hit. In all other cases the rule of course is to keep to the right but persons walking on roads should keep to the left side.

of things about to light. What a day there would be when the intellects ala controlled the workers and enslaved the capitalists! He had been one of those who believed that Leslie was to be the savior of America. Leslie had died, but others would be raised up. Smucker's visions of vengeance were stupendous. They drew down a little when he reflected that he must face that scowl domestic economist, Mrs. Adolf. He drew his month's unearned salary vindictively.

At eleven-thirty Bill Pelham, summoned by telephone, sauntered into Hanby's office. He was a tall man, above middle height, with dark hair and eyes. His was a tired, lined face —the face of a man to whom success has not come. No man was closer to him than Hanby.

"Here's the dog market, Bill!" Hanby greeted.

"I don't know; but my business is going to the dogs, if that's what you mean. We can't all guess where the wheel is going to stop. Sorry I couldn't get to your dinner party last night. Irma rang me up and told me that my absence was the only blemish."

"That's a fact, Bill." Hanby looked at him keenly. "You don't relish this country life idea?"

"It's a tragedy to me," Pelham groaned. "Your home is my home. You let me come when I want to and leave when I want to. You ask no vain questions, and my grouches never make you angry. I don't know what the devil I shall do. You've been blessed above all the men I know. Your wife is pretty and popular, and yet they don't go rushing city with chauffeurs. Your food is peculiar, and yet he keeps clean. I've often thought the Hanby family was sent to show that decency was possible even in this lost life we lead. Do I relish your going? Don't make a fool of me!"

"You'll be at the Gray house, too. You can't drop out of our lives, so easily and quickly as that. Funny place, the Gray house! I suppose you read that my caretaker was murdered last night?"

"Haven't seen the morning papers. Tell me about it."

"A puzzling crime," commented Pelham, when he had heard all that his friend knew.

"I may be next," Hanby said, wondering how long Bill could maintain his air of complete insouciance. "Irma is a widow, with the chance of marrying a better man."

"Don't!" said Bill, frowning. "I don't like to hear you make a joke of that sort of thing. If Irma died, could you ever marry again?"

"Need God, no! Of course not," replied Hanby, startled.

"She couldn't either, Bill, old man, don't you know that every now and again in the human family two people are born like Irma and you—a couple whom nothing can separate, but death! I've watched you with other women, and I've watched Irma with other men—pretty women to—and better looking causes than you. You've been over seas a woman you care a d—n for since you met Ag—"

"Sh!"

"And also seen no other man. Y two are marvels. That family of yours is what it is because of Ir

"I didn't mean that about Irma Hanby said, a little stiffly. "You know men don't like to seem sentimental. Your friendship has been a great deal to me, Bill, and you are not going to desert me?"

"I worship Irma," Bill Pelham said fervidly. "And I am fond of you, too, after twenty years, I know that she is the one woman for you. He added whimsically, "Every Christmas she gives me a tie for under the double fee. Once every year! You can bet I would be with you on Christmas eve, anyway."

Hanby smiled.

"If we were in some European possession, I should have to challenge you to a duel for that old Bill you've the ability, submissive villain you chose for darling. Bill recoiled at that. "I should never dishonor a good dark lady and the rich she ever which you should like my roster to—not. He laughed a cigarette. "Why did you ask her to come?"

"To charm your Aunt Selina."

"How the devil did you know I had an Aunt Selina? She was a great-grandaunt, a playmate of Martha Washington, if the family history is correct."

"I didn't know it. Look here, Bill —Irma's all upset about some nervy spirits who have been trying to frighten me away from Pine Flains. Do you admit anything here and pretending to be Miss Selenon, who hated and despised my absence all week, and pinned her faith on dogs?"

"One of us is crazy," replied Bill Pelham. "At the time you say I was here, a dozen men will prove that I was in Chicago. I have played practical jokes, and I hope to again, if I live; but I know nothing of this. Tell me all."

Hanby described not only his experience but that of Adolf Smucker.

"You can count Reggie out, too," Pelham declared. "He's at the bankers' convention in Baltimore. These two people may be fakes, but Reggie and I are honored." Silly sort of stories to tell?"

"That's what Irma said."

"Is she worried?"

"Just a little. Nothing physical can scare her, but she takes funny psychological excursions. She was reading an Englishbook on Haunted Houses' when I left."

"There are such things," Pelham said, gravely. "Ghosts exist, for one, and the house where the Wes boys lived. I don't know enough to disbelieve. Look here, Hanby, we've got to get to the bottom of this."

"What do you suggest?"

"I've got a clear day. I'll interview the man you bought the place from, and find out about past tenants. Also, I'll see if there was a Selenon family holding land grants in California. I'll probably drop in after dinner. Where are you off to?" concluded Pelham, as Hanby reached for his hat.

"Pine Plains. Junior is motoring me up. I'll be back by dinner time.

with luck. Anyhow, wait for me. I've got to see about another caterer and arrange for the burial at Kerr. Not a cent was found on him, and it seems that he has no relatives. I feel responsible, in a way. Junior seems to think that he's going to be a Sherlock Holmes, to the chagrin and confusion of the Pine Plains police."

"There is no such thing as a mean business crime," Pelham remarked. "Motive may be of some help."

"I hope so. I want to clear up everything, so that Dina and Celia won't have a chance to feel nervous. Dina has a vague idea that the coast is dangerous. She was raised in Cleveland's most select residential district, and has always lived in cities. I'm a wild man from the Mountainous Land country, and the idea of trumps doesn't give me a thrill at all."

"If I know Dina," Bill said thoughtfully, "she'll be less worried about burglars than she will about any report of curse on the place. Like many of those highly strung women, she's perfectly sensitive. If all these tragedies happened there, she's horrified to hear of them. You've already had a murder on your front lawn."

"That's not serious," Hanby returned. "Some wandering yegg killed the poor fellow for his savings."

"I wish you hadn't said that. Selenon woman off without getting more particulars from her. You rarely tell all avenues of information."

Her manner was so infernally intriguing, Bill. You know I'm not the sort of man to be told that I must tell the house I've selected as a home after inspecting hundreds of places. Her cool old thing was crazy."

"What about Smucker?"

"Hasn't killed there. Smucker's got too well balanced, either."

Bill Pelham shook his head.

"I don't like it," he said.
