AN OPTICAL INSTRUMENT

The eye is an optical instrument approximately perfect. It is provided by Nature with an interior lens which focuses images on the retina, or screen of the eye, where they are sensed by the brain. In this way man sees.

The perfect eye, of course, gives perfect results. When, however, its optical system becomes deranged, or for any reason is abnormal, the rays of light are focused either before or behind the retina, and imperfect vision results.

Then artificial means must be employed to correct this defective optical system.

This is where the science of optics comes to our aid.

NEIGHBORS

(Minona Irving)

My house is in the woods a mile from town

And yet I do not lark for company, Though I should roam the wide world up and down

More charming neighbors I could never see;

The little chipmunk, smart in ruddy brown,

The muskrats, and the cheerful chickadee

And in the dusk a bird of much renown,

The whippoorwill, that passing, calls to me.

They are no talktalks who speak to me fair

And talk behind my back with this injustice

That a fox comes out to take the air

Through meadows with the early frost impearled;

Like me, he only seeks a peaceful lair

And in the spring when ferns are first unfurled

The humming-bird flits by, a jewel rare;

I have the finest neighbors in the world.
