SWEETSTATORS

By John S. Gardner, Kentucky College of Agriculture

Every garden should have some sweet potatoes, if only a few, for the returns from the little work they require are quite pleasing.

Sweet potatoes call for relatively "poor" ground; if too much manure is present, the tops grow rankly and yield will result. It is best to choose a spot that has not been heavily manured for a year, at least, and to spread on commercial fertilizer.

The slips should be set at about the depth they stood in the bed and the planting in the ridge about 12 inches to 18 inches. In any garden where all setting time it is of advantage to use water, for it settles the soil about the hole.

Cultivation should be given often enough and thoroughly enough to keep down weed growth. It is best to ridge in a shallow skimming of the ridges and the dressing of fresh, loose, mellow earth to repair any damage done them in working. Never disturb the "bed" of the ridges and never harvest tuber against them unless necessary. In dry weather this is risky practice because it exposes the roots and the drying air, if much time elapses before the soil is again worked. Deep and in itself draws more moisture from the ridge, for it is also exposed. Light skimming of the ridge is the better method for the average person, under most conditions.

There are very few insect pests likely to feed the crop. It is best, too, to keep ground that has not been in sweet potatoes for at least one year. For the farmer should be on the lookout for wire worms, so that too much top-growth should not be produced. Wire worms are attracted by decaying vegetable matter and are found in greatest numbers in sod land. Clean cultivation is the best remedy.

Digging should be done before frost, for sweet potatoes is unique. It should be done when the tuber is fully grown, but if it should go 25 feet, and even further than that. If the soil is plowed in the middle portion which would expose the potatoes to the action of the sprouts, is reduced.
