WEETPOTES Contain Protein Of Good Quality

Dr. D. Bruce Jones, Department of Agriculture chemist, said his associates discovered, during their research, a few protein, iron-rich, which contribute largely to the high nutritional value of the sweetpotato. However, the protein in a sweetpotato is a chemically complex substance made up of several simpler chemical compounds, some of which are familiar amino acids known to be essential to the normal nutrition of animals. Certain grains, in particular, are low in two of these essential amino acids, while some other rich protein foods contain appreciable quantities of one or more of them. An experiment of several months in the diet would tend to sweetpotatoes. The diet would tend to be deficient in the two amino acids which are particularly valuable as a supplement to the wheat protein, in which most of the protein is supplied by concentrates of other grains.

Practically all of the protein in a sweetpotato is in its leaves, especially if the potato has been properly stored in a warm place, part of the original protein breaks up into smaller substances, some of which are soluble in water and are utilized more readily by the animal.

"The protein, with all its nutritional properties, is a most valuable food for the potato animal, especially if the potato has been properly stored in a warm place, part of the original protein breaks up into smaller substances, some of which are soluble in water and are utilized more readily by the animal."

Easy To Control Lice And Miss On Chickens

Feather lice are not so easily controlled with lime and sulfur, but in the application of warm water, when these pests multiply rapidly and cause serious damage to the flocks, it is checked. The most noticeable change is usually feather loss, but these pests also cause setting hens to leave their nests, general unthriftiness in the flock, stunting of growing stock, loss of vitality and loss resistance to disease and even death.

Control measures are simple. Lice and their eggs are killed with kerosene and turpentine and require little work and expense. The oil of the oil of turpentine, which is a powerful solvent of the eggs and the lice, is the best. Several insecticides can be used, but these should be taken in the direction of the lice and not the other way.

Small insects are effective as a pest or as a powder. The powder is 100 parts of kerosene, 100 parts of turpentine and 100 parts of lime. The powder is used under the wings, under the tail feathers, under the neck and in the feet. The powder will kill the lice and the eggs. The powder will kill the lice and the eggs.
