HINTS TO FARMERS

Black locust has a strong, spreading root system which makes the tree of much value to plant for checking erosion.

A dry cow needs plenty of minerals. Well-cured legume hay with wheat bran, cottonseed meal, or linseed meal will supply these.

Dairy specialists of the U. S. Department of Agriculture advise against milking a cow just before calving. If the udder is swollen excessively, reduce the concentrate ration.

Chickens in the breeding flock need some source of vitamin E. This vitamin affects fertility and seems to be necessary to reproduction. The best source of vitamin E is wheat germ, although green feeds, germinated oats, yellow corn, cotton seed and olive oils, and milk contain it in small quantities.

Hog cholera is often mistaken for influenza, pneumonia, parasites in the intestines, and worse physical troubles the Bureau of Animal Industry. Even a veterinarian may be unable to diagnose hog cholera until he makes a post-mortem examination. The farmer who suspects hog cholera in his herd should call in a trained veterinarian.

Most poultrymen use the tobacco-dust treatment for large intestinal roundworms in the poultry flock, but there is a new treatment which is quicker and more effective, says the U. S. Department of Agriculture. It is a dose of tetrachlorethylene. One cubic centimeter is given in a gelatine capsule.

Big fertilizers according to the U. S. Department of Agriculture. Trade names are confusing. The composition of a mixture put out under a fancy trade name may be different from season to season. Also, sometimes fertilizers with different grades are sold under the same trade name.

Cultivated vines, clover, grasses, and legumes the kinds of crops that help protect them during the winter months, reduce soil erosion greatly, says the U. S. Department of Agriculture. The same is true of cover crops turned under in the spring. Cultivated crops, such as corn, cotton, potatoes, and tobacco, leave the soil bare during the winter months.

Practice contour planting on hilly land, says the U. S. Department of Agriculture. Plowing and cultivating up and down the slope is the cause of much soil erosion. Contour planting breaks the force of heavy rains and helps to prevent the soil from washing away. Furrows and rows when planting and cultivating field crops. This helps to hold the rain through where both row when ratchets the water and holds some of it under it soaks into the soil.
