A HERMIT THRUSH SINGS

(Peter A. Lea)

Through the dusk of autumn trees that the wild wind shakes,
Through the dusk of autumn trees that awakes
The Hermit Thrush—mellowly during the day
He guesses that day is near, and night
And the theme of his music holds these,
And wishes and hopes and more than these,
His song is of confidence carried on
Firmly, trustingly to wait the dawn!
What matter that host of pearl-gray stars
Are all a bird sees through the wood's dark bars?
Oh, he knows that the dew is only a veil
Hiding a sunrise that will not fail!
Then he knows the darkness of all good things
Blesses the earth—so he sings and sings!

"AND THE NIGHT WAS YOUNG"

A moon rose
And a cloud fled
And stars went winging
Overhead.
A wind stole
Behind the hill
And kissed a sleeping
Daffodil.
A bird cried
In the lonely day
Where Heaven first
Sank to a spark.
A leaf pirouetted
And sighing fell;
A small forester
His lonely shell.
A fountain sang
With silver tongue;
The moon laughed
And the night was young.
—Sydney King Russell, in "The Golden Book."

SUMMER AFTERNOON

Shadows over the meadows,
Shadows under the trees,
Heat waves rising and falling
And the sweet, hot breeze
Swallows darting—winging,
The river very still,
Somewhere children laughing
And the sun behind the hill.
—Elsa Rowe.

Ancient Egyptians had portraits of themselves placed in their tombs to serve as substitutes in the future world in case of destruction of their own bodies.

ALWAYS I SHALL REMEMBER

Always I shall remember how the night
Comes on a garden. There can be Here by
A silence deeper than the day's last light.
Brings to a closing petal. Sleepily
A tulip yawns and nods upon the wind;
A bluebell tinkles faintly; four o'clocks
Forget that Time beats on eternally.
Folded in crimson slumber. Hollyhocks
Breathe delicately as music that is dimmed
To memory; a bee sways on the stocks
Where shadows hide his golden finery.
The moon comes slowly and its white hand rocks
The gate until the last bright firefly goes
Into the dark cathedral of a rose.
