OLD COUNTRYSIDE

Beyond the hour we counted rain
That fell
On the slant shutter, all has come to proof
Of summer thunder, like a wooden bell.
Rang in the storm above the mansard roof.

And mirrors cast the cloudy days along
The attic floor; the wind made the clapboards creak
You braced against the wall to make it strong.

Of the state. The Cynthiana Democrat.

Long since, we pulled down oak-leaves to the ground
In winter of dry trees; we heard the rock
Shout its unplaceable cry, the axe's sound
Delay a moment after the axe's stroke.

Far back, we saw, in the stillest of the year
The scrawled vine shudder, and the rose-branch shore
Red to the thorns, and sharp as night can bear,
The thin hound's body arched against the snow.
