CHILD AUTO DRIVERS

(Owensboro Messenger)

A 14-year-old Owensboro high school girl, driving an automobile along a public highway, recently struck a seven-year-old boy who was riding a bicycle. The boy wasn't badly hurt, and witnesses said the girl did everything an adult driver could have done to avoid hitting him. But it preyed on her mind, and the tragic upshot was that after a sleepless night of worry the girl consulted a physician.

It's a pitiful little story, and it makes a sad commentary on the automobile age. Why should a child of that age be permitted to drive a car in heavy traffic—or, for that matter, in any kind of traffic? Handling an automobile these days is strictly a job for adults. The nervous strain that the accidents of the road can bring to a driver is something no 14-year-old ought to have to shoulder.

SONG OF THE SUN

I am the sun, I am above the mountains,
My joy is on me, I will give you day!
I will spend day among you like a king!
Your water shall be wine because I reign!
I stave my golden vintage on the mountains,
And all your rushing rivers run with day!
I am the sun, I am above the mountains!
Arise, my hand is open, it is day!
Rise! as men strike a bell and make it music;
So have I struck the earth and made it day!
More, more, O world, on all your brazen hinges
Send round the thunder of your golden wheels;
Throng out, O millions, out, O shouting day!
Throng out, O millions, shouting, shouting day!
For as one blows a trumpet through the valleys,
So from my golden trumpet I blow day!

WOULD TRUST PRESIDENT

(Joe Cumbler in Cynthiana Democrat.)

There has been quite a bit of resentment in some ex-service men at the President's curtailment of compensation. If I were drawing compensation, however, I would much prefer that President Roosevelt have the power to raise or lower the amounts than have Congressional control. The president would be much more sympathetic to a meritorious case. And less harsh in dealing with non-meritorious cases. The latter by far outnumber the first named. Unfortunately there are many who believe that military service gave them open sesame to the government's strong box and that no matter how they received, an injury, or how slight, they are entitled to and should receive compensation.

I might be wrong in my way of thinking and compensation but here is the way I view the proposition: There isn't too much that can be done for the men who suffered real disabilities; while in the actual line of duty. That does not exactly mean battle injuries. There were many hurt in ways that make them worthy of compensation. There were others who received compensation that were not entitled to and this prevented the worthy ones from getting all that was coming to them.

BROWN THRASHER

(By J. G. Warma, in Springfield Sun.)

The Brown Thrasher is another sweet singing bird that every boy and girl should know. When driving through the country, no doubtless have seen him and have perhaps mistaken him for the first runaway. But so many people have done

The Brown Thrasher is a shy, retiring bird. His favorite haunts are along hedge rows, shrubbery, about the borders of woodlands and along roads. Sometimes he will forget his shyness and boldly assert your right, and even be so bold as to build a nest in the yard.

Like many thicket-haunting birds, who ordinarily shun observation, the Brown Thrasher can, when roused, place when he gives the world an exhibition of his ability as a vocalist. Sometimes he takes a notion to sit on the topmost branch of a tree and, like the Mocking Bird, proceed to entertain the birds. He builds his nest in brush heaps, vines, thorn, trees and in thickets near the ground. The nest is composed of sticks, coarse roots, leaves and pieces of bark. It is a bulky affair, lacking in touch of an artist.

There are six eggs may be found in the nest. They are bluish white, or grayish white, speckled with cinnamon and lilac spots.

The Thrasher is about eleven and a half inches in length. His upper parts and tail are reddish brown. The throat and breast are white, other parts white, streaked with black, except the throat. He likes fruit but is mostly wild fruit he eats. If you watch him, you will discover that he takes his food mostly from the ground. He also scratches the ground like a chicken, using his bill to dig.

Sleeping at night is only a habit, says Prof. Nathan Kleitman of the University of Chicago. Resting during the day would be just as beneficial.
