Good Judgment.

It was the contention of those who fought the present consumers' sales tax that the gross sales tax, known as the "chain store tax," would be held constitutional and that sufficient funds would be derived from this revenue measure by the State.

Now that the chain store tax has been held to be constitutional, one realizes what a sorry mess would have resulted had the Legislature depended upon the constitutionality of this law and made appropriations in anticipation of revenue from that source.

The last Legislature, taking a realistic view of the matter, passed the chain store tax, passed in 1930 and now declared to be unconstitutional, and enacted in the dead a measure based on a license for each store increasing as the number of stores in a chain increased. This law has been enacted in Indiana and has stood the Supreme Court test.

Judgment of the Administration has been vindicated," says the Union County Advocate. "The probability of an adverse court decision was foreseen and the measure of undiscounted validity was enacted for the necessary purpose of providing revenue which is ready to finance the state's portion of the budget and will adequately support the weakened school system, to give vital aid to counties of the state, and to meet the needs of the septic of bankruptcy because unable to pay the interest on their bonds and retire maturing bonds due.

Because conservative views guided the administration in its course the adverse decision of the Supreme Court has been discounted and minimized."

A Road Beset With Thorns.

Commenting upon the action of the President in ordering an investigation into the charges of relief in Ohio, where the Governor, Martin L. Davey, is a Democrat and there is more than a chance that some of the charges of irregularity may have originated in the camps of the Governor's political enemies, The Christian Science Monitor says:

It would seem, therefore, that just in the crisis of the works relief it is when signs of non-partisanship are particularly needed, the Administration gives evidence of its political impartiality. Democrats in Congress are assured. Their party regularity is posited. An unpleasant odor is abroad, and they would have much preference to keep the lid on. Yet the country generally should have more confidence in the President because he did not hesitate to lift it."

The road of a President who would act without partisan bias is beset with thorns. The practical application of his own party creed and the appointees selected from the opposing camp are sometimes not above boring from within against their benefactor. In the end—and under the new order, perhaps—the theory may need be negotiated more easily than in past years. And if answer can do it, Roosevelt can.

Why Not Careful Pedestrians?

The Richmond Register points out that in five out of eight cases where pedestrians were killed by an automobile last year, the pedestrian was entirely to blame. "Thirty-five per cent of the pedestrians who were killed because of their own carelessness were struck while crossing in the middle of the block or against the traffic signals," says the Register, seventeen per cent while walking on the wrong side of the road; eleven per cent of the pedestrian fatalities involved children playing in the streets; nine per cent of the fatalities resulted from walkers stepping suddenly out from behind parked cars into the stream of traffic. It is a significant fact that, in 1934 the rate of death per pedestrian accident was 6 per cent worse crossing in the middle of the block than at the intersection and 74 per cent worse crossing against signals than with them."

So it would seem that the careless, speeding, or drunken driver, though constitutionally responsible for serious and must be curbed, is not entirely responsible for the tragic total of 39,000 lives snuffed out last year by automobiles.

The pedestrians seem to realize that they are equally responsible with the driver of an automobile in the avoidance of accidents. Of course this cannot apply to small children, but three should be careful pedestrian will be careful drivers. The careful pedestrian will obey traffic lights, look before crossing any thoroughfare and when walking on the highway, take the left hand side of the road.

The Legion's Universal Draft Act.

It needs only the necessary match, it would seem, to light the fire of war again in Europe, a conflagration almost sure to spread from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Germany, France, Italy, England and Russia.

Are we to have another World War, certain to be more horrible than the last? Many writers and observers believe that such a titanic struggle is inevitable. And if war comes in Europe, what role will this country play? Surely we shall not again embark upon another expedition to Europe, fooling ourselves with the fatuous belief that we can end all wars; surely we will mind our own business this time.

Few men will be found in this country who would refuse to take up arms in defense of the United States, thousands have no stomach, however, for a foreign war. The insane mess of military age today will not be caught, we think, by the hysteria of the World War days, not even by the memory of those days, not by the lessons learned by exhortations to avoid service as they were in 1917. The modern generation has seen how little is accomplished by the sacrifice of lives in the quarrels of the world safe for democracy.

The American Legion has the right idea about it. In its plan to draft all of the resources of this country in the event of war, to take over the ammunition plants, to draft capital and industry, as well as young men. It has thus said—and it is true—that if those who fatten their purses as the result of war were forced to fight, or to give up their fortunes, as the young men lay down their lives, there would be no war.

How quickly the toilers of war would begin to talk peace, were wealth as well as man power drafted. While Europe seethes with warlike zeal, let the Legion push its Universal Draft act.

AN EDITOR'S RANDOM THOUGHTS

"Perhaps we could confute the cynics most completely by admitting once for all that springtime is not a season of the year but a faith, an aspiration. Anyone who is looking for the first day of spring, running forward toward it, counting off the weeks of winter triumphantly—such a person has the springtime already within him, and it is in vain that he seeks it outside. At the very most all that he can discover in verse, wood or field or sky is a sort of corroboration. He is not surprised by the earliest flash of the arbutus only because it seems so strange that a flower should know his secret, and the first call of the bluebird from the pasture rail tells him only what he knew before."

There is a deal of truth in that, I think. The winter hunger for spring is often, like fireside-gardening, as keenly enjoyed in anticipation as in the frequently disappointing realization. And yet, Spring is Spring and the dullest of us feel the urge of the awakening call coming down the infinitude of years that have written the history of all living beings. It is like an ever-recurring pageant that strengthens and bolsters somehow, with its beauty, man's hope that to him shall come an awakening after sleep.

• • •

Last Sunday I saw the robins flocking in the cemetery on the hill. It was near twilight and a new note, like the chatter of blackbirds going noisily to bed. I had never heard that note, and in the dim light I thought they were strange migrants until one bird gave plaint in the robin tonality, a twilight song, sad but so of the spring that it is cheery. Soon these will be busy with their mud-plastered nests and there will be fledglings soon. When Spring calls, the red-breast answers, ere they wooebyter has ceased listening to the music of his drum. Much to see; much to make one think, in springtime.

• • •

Much to see, much to hear, in God's out-of-doors, even now—

Such time as goes before the wal
When all the woods stand in a mist of green
And nothing perfect.

Until the roses come and one stands 'knee deep in June.' So much to see, to enjoy, to learn of the varied language that Nature uses. Even the birds' songs that must be spent indoors, as the symphony of Spring's orchestra rises to its fortissimo as the fields grow vocal with bird songs. It is a beauty the enjoyment of which with bird songs. It is a beauty the enjoyment of which leaves no cloying satiety, for it is the lovely portrayal of that beautiful, ever-changing, unfinished life, of which we all are a part.

I hope that when the days of chimney corner come to me, if I reach that stage of life, that I shall not lose my joy of spring, of the first crocus, the first pasqueflower, the first robin; of a shower with their fresh earthy smell, of the coming of the purple martins, of all the ways of birds and flowers, and their graceful flight.

Ah, one must turn to the poets, the makers of songs. Ah, one must turn to the poets, the makers of songs. And so this flowing requires, from William Stanley Braithwaite:

Heart free, hand free,
Blue above, blue under,
All the world to me
Is a place for wonder.
Rain shine, moon shine,
Stars, and winds a-blowing,
All into this heart of mine
Flowing, flowing, flowing!
Mind free, eyes free,
Dare to follow after,
Joys of life sold to me
For the price of laughter.
Girl's love, man's love,
Love of work and duty,
Just a will of God's to prove
Beauty, beauty, beauty!

Spring is on the way and by the same token, spring poets are ripe and rife.

"But, on the whole," writes John Burroughs, "poets have not been eminently successful in depicting spring." They do not have spring in a line or two of Chaucer. There is more of spring in a line or two of Chaucer and Spenser than in the elaborate portraits of her by Thomson or Pope. Burns and Scott have had spring in their ink-horns."

Spring poets, with the call of the gentle season in their ink-horns and not in their hearts, might take a leaf from the book of the wisest of Hebrew kings. Wise was he with his glory and power, his multiplicity of wives, there was spring 'and a bit of love in the heart of the man who wrote:

"For lo, the winter is past, the rain is over and gone; the flowers appear on the earth; the time of the singing of birds is come, and the voice of the turtle is heard in our land."

A Deserved Recognition Of Ability.

The appointment of Judge H. Church Ford to the Federal bench is a deserved recognition of eminent abilities and high character.

This writer has known Church Ford for many years and has watched with admiration his steady rise to eminence. It is pleasant to see an old schoolmate so signally honored and to know that he is thoroughly worthy of the honor.

We predict that Judge Ford will serve with a distinction that will mark him as a worthy successor to the able gentleman whom he succeeds, the late Judge A. M. J. Cochran.

POEMS THAT WE LIKE

SHEILA

Katy had the gravest eyes, and Della had a way with her,
Just Mary and the saintly face, and Maggie's waist was neat,
But Sheila had the merry heart that traveled all the day with her,
That put the laughing on her lips and dancing in her feet.

I've met with maidens in my time, and, faith, they were a treat of it,
To call her trouble out to dance and step it with a song
Ah! but Sheila had the laugh the like of the drink to weary ones,
I've never heard the beat of it for all I've wandered wide,
And out of all the girls I know—the tender ones, the dreary ones—
'Twas only Sheila of the laugh that broke her heart and died.

Snapshots of KENTUCKY GEOLOGY by Dr. A. C. McFarlan UNIVERSITY OF KENTUCKY

In the following articles an attempt is made to picture some of the noteworthy and interesting aspects of Kentucky geology. The area has a varied reputation, ranging from those who consider it as having a supernatural ability to see through solid rock into cavernous underground, to those who have a suspicion that there is more scenery than science invested, and that one man can penetrate as far underground with his vision as another. There is little question on this last point, but recall the Biblical quotation concerning those who have eyes but see not, or seeing do not understand. Mark Twain at one time remarked that there is something fascinating about scenery. He continues, "One gets such wholesome pleasure in contemplating such a trifling investment in fact." There is perhaps an element of truth in the statement, but it is surprising the wealth of information that can be gleaned from a very limited amount of observed fact.

Another aspect is illustrated by the experience of the writer in taking his first field trip under the auspices of the University. This friend, basking forth in the light of the sun, looked at today's natural wonders, finally exclaimed his interest in unfolding life, of which we all are a part.

I hope that when the days of chimney corner come to me, if I reach that stage of life, that I shall not lose my joy of spring, of the first crocus, the first pasqueflower, the first robin; of a shower with their fresh earthy smell, of the coming of the purple martins, of all the ways of birds and flowers, and their graceful flight.

SO SAY WE ALL

Editor A. Robbins in Hickman Courier:

I am sometimes amazed at the efforts made to get stuff into the paper free. I mean stuff that is rightfully classed as advertising. Our policy is to charge for all we do—a day with free publicity sent us by manufacturing firms, business houses organizations, the various fraternal and benevolent institutions of the government, individuals, etc. If we tend to use one-tenth of it, there would be room for nothing else in the paper and it all the money that we spend on sending us the free publicity stuff were to be spent on paid advertising, we would be quite prosperous. I should think it would be embarrassing to those sending free publicity, that if a newspaper has ever accepted all the free publicity they asked for it would completely fill the newspaper and no one would read it, so their free publicity would still be wasted.

A WISE MOVE

Bath County News-Outlook:

Certainly the Bath County Board of Education deserves the applause of the people in the courageous step it took here Monday in abolishing all such districts, thus taking out of the hands of sub-district trustees the power to recommend teachers. Nothing that the board has done in recent years will accomplish more for the betterment of the school system than divorcing the schools and partisanship the teachers, from the worst sort of petty politics.

It means, for one thing, that there will be no more trustee elections for while it does not, strictly speaking, eliminate the trustee, he is, nevertheless, shorn of much authority. He still holds his office until his present term expires (one year hence) but his power and duties are swept away.

All sorts of abuses sprang up under the old system that can now be effectually stamped out. The trustees in most districts invariably left in its wake enemies that disrupted communities for years and acted as a detriment to both teachers and pupils.

The Bath County News-Outlook heartily commends Mr. Hosten and the members of the Board of Education for their courage and foresight in the belief that the people of the county will support them in this progressive step.

Transylvania Stagecrafters To Put George Cohan Play

In accordance with its policy of producing a play of producing the best one Shakespearean drama and one modern comedy each year, the Stagecraft crs, of Transylvania College, will present the Merchant of Venice and The Tavern, as the modern contribution to its program. Its dramatic success was scored with the interpretation of The Merchant of Venice last fall, in which Prof. Edward Sanborn appeared in the role of Shylock and received high praise recently by the group here included. As You Like It, and Julius Cesaar, are expected to follow.

Mr Saxon, who will direct the Tavern, was at one time engaged by the company of Cohan and Harris to play in the famous Fortune production. Stagecrafters Hunter of Boone Cohan plays have given other Cohan plays in the past. There Was, and last year, Baby Cyclone, a farce comedy which was well received. The part of the vaudeland in the play The Tavern was played by Mr. Cohan in the New York run, Mr. Winston Hobbs who will take the part in the Stagecrafter version of it. The part that appeals to his dramatic instincts, mainly because it is peculiar, the writer of the story says appreciate the psychic elements can do it well. He has played in many plays including a number on the campus, including a character part in the Baby Cyclone, as Orlando in As You Like It, and as Basanio in The Merchant of Venice. Having graduated in January, Mr. Hobbs has been retained in the department of Expression as assistant to Professor Saxon.

The Tavern, which was secured by special permission of Samuel French, Inc., for Mr. Cohan, will be given in the auditorium of Morrison Clay High School, Lexington, April 12.

Relief Garden Seed Due About April 1

Seed for approximately 108,000 relief gardens to be raised in Kentucky this year have been received at Louisville warehouses and will be ready to be shipped in bulk to the various counties about April 1st, it was announced. The seed in the counties, projects employing relief labor will be set up to pack the seed in individual packages for distribution to relief clients who have signed applications for gardens, it was announced. Each garden seed already received while clients are signing up for the administration of relief in Kentucky. It is strictly a garden seed to receive them.

Dr. E. E. Pittman, state garden specialist, said the seed would be furnished as potatoes, parsnips, peas, beans, onions, mustard, spinach, peas, beets, carrots, beans, sweet corn, squash and cantaloupes. Other summer squash and sweet potato plants will be distributed at the proper time from beds grown in each of the counties. Clients will be required to furnish their own onion sets due to the scarcity and inability of the Federal Emergency Relief Administration to furnish the necessary funds.

World's Radio Sets Exceed 50 Million

DANIEL BOONE and KENTUCKY by Dr. Charles M. Knapp UNIVERSITY OF KENTUCKY XVIII

In the year 1819, Chester Harding, a portrait painter of some note, went out from St. Louis with the definite intention of making a portrait of Boone. He found him at the time living alone in a cabin, a part of an old brick house, evidently having been used as a store for the clothing of one of his children. He was at the moment of his arrival busily at a stray of wolves in the vicinity of his ramrod, busy turning it better a brisk fire, seasoning it with salt and pepper. There Harding explained the purpose of his visit, and Boone obligingly agreed to sit for his portrait. During their days together Boone told him many reminiscences of his early days in the wilderness that was then Kentucky. Harding once asked him whether he had ever been lost. Boone's answer was typical of her and of the state of mind upon the back of Tourse Creek, about a mile from the Missouri river.

"Their graves were neglected until 1845, when the legislature of Kentucky made a strong appeal to the people of Missouri to allow their bones to be removed to Frankfort, where it was promised that a suitable monument would be erected. The request was granted and the bones removed to their present resting place in the cemetery at Frankfort, overlooking the Kentucky river along whose banks and those of its tributaries Daniel Boone passed so many happy and troublous days. But the transference of the bones showed his indifference again developed among Kentuckians. The State Journal for a suitable monument did not materialize. Then, in the year 1880, the project was revived, and the present monument was erected. Since that time, it has become the Mecca of hundreds of visitors to the State Historical Society to hold its annual meetings in the city of Frankfort and for the erection of a memorial to Daniel Boone through the efforts of the Boone Society to find the remains of the pioneer's wife, Rebecca Bryan Boone, and to have them interred with those of her husband.
