QUEER SUPERSTITIONS

Superstitions regarding the prevention and cure of disease have persisted from the earliest times. Many of them being still prevalent in the more backward sections of the country. A few were called to mind in a recent writer, in noting the death of an aged Kentuckian, who was reported to wear earrings to the last in the belief that they were good for the eyesight.

Another old-time notion was that wearing a medicine was beneficial to weak eyes, just as it was thought that carrying a buckeye or a potato in the pocket would prevent or cure rheumatism.

One doesn't have to be so very old to remember when children were capped to wear a little bag of asafetida string around the neck as a protection against "catching" diseases and when in many homes bunches of various dried herbs were kept on hand for the same purpose. Some believe that keeping a goat around the house was a prime health measure.

These superstitions, like the belief that a horseshoe nailed to a barn barrel would turn into a snake, are gradually dying out—but many prevalently believed persists to this day will refuse to take the third birth from a match, or walk under a ladder, for fear of dire consequences.

For each city dweller in the United States farmers annually raise about one-fourth acre of wheat, three-fourths acre of corn and one-eighth acre of cotton.

AFTER THE HARVEST

(Pearl Logan Woodbridge)
After the harvest,
Fields lie still
Waiting for Nature
To work her will;
Waiting for sunshine,
Wind and rain.
To fit them for

For a short season
I shall not sing—
I shall lie fallow—
Wait for the spring;
I shall drink beauty
Deep in my heart—
For of such seed do
Bright songs start.
