Alibi Witness

By GEORGE CRONYN

© McClure Newspaper Syndicate, WNU Service.

FRANK KOONTZ, alias Kid Holbrook, was on trial for murder. He was a rural gangster who had done time for robbery and assault; he was suspected of being one of the trio who had staged the fruitless bank holdup in which the cashier was slain. On a hot July Tuesday he had gone down into the Oak Ridge district and was shot from ambush on the road leading into Dorham Four Corners.

The crime occurred on Saturday, at exactly 10:35 a. m., the moment when the trooper's watch stopped as he fell against a rock.

"Murder! Stick take the stand!"

This was the surprise witness for the defense. It was rumored, who would establish an alibi for the young ex convict who had viewed the proceedings with only a cool and impassive demeanor. So far the state, in the person of the fiery prosecuting attorney, had been unable to pin anything definite upon the defendant other than a chance of recital with no more serious charge than carrying a concealed weapon. The weapon was a revolver. Trooper Jack Bell was killed with a hatchet.

Martha Childs was sworn in: a woodsman, tall, lean, grizzled, clad in flannel shirt and a faded flannel skirt, with keen gray eyes and a dignity that might make a favorable impression upon the jury and auditors. He disposed that he was a widower, that he owned, by trade a sawyer and axe man. While the mill was not busy, he had personally cut wood for the folks in Dorham. "Stick Childs? Sure, I know him much." The defense attorney proceeded with the examination in chief.

"You live alone on this ridge?"

"What's that to do in Dorham?"

"Well, I go to the store and lay in a stock of supplies. I get my mail there and home, and notice a sack of flour, if I'm out. There's the store, and the post office, and the village. I've been there for the last mail, which is Sat'day, and I'm back to my cabin on the ridge. Where have I stopped since Saturday? Why, I've been right here, working at my trade. The seventeenth of the month, two weeks to the day, I've been right here, working."

"Yes sir, so you!"

"But you—I ask you to search your memory and tell me if Childs could—did not at that time see in the post office a person there that you recognized as this court room?"

The defense attorney, the audience and crowded chairs necks; the prisoner made a quick move of interest. Then Attorney Martin Childs slowly raised a long arm and pointed a finger at the prisoner. "I have," he answered, said distinctly. "I seen this man sitting before the post office about half past two!"

"What was he doing there?"

"He was looking at an army notice and—and—"

"Are you sure that is the man?"

"Certainly, that or one so like it I wouldn't hesitate!"

"That is for the defense. Your Honor!"

The prosecuting attorney began the cross-examination. Martin Childs's testimony remained unshaken. His voice slowly. The prosecuting attorney smoothed a rusty black coat, and turned to put for the jury to see.

"Childs, I ask you if the cross on this map indicates the location of your home?"

The witness peered at the map. "Yes sir, that's the place."

"You have always lived there?"

"No, sir, only since my wife died down below, in Coon Hollow."

"Where were you, Mr. Childs?"

For a second the witness hesitated, then said clearly: "I was in the war. He never came back from the war!"

The prosecuting attorney's lip curled sardonically. "Mr. Childs," he said coldly, "the county records show that you were married 24 years ago. Did you marry at the age of six or seven?"

The lips of the witness moved, but no sound came forth.

Mr. Martin objected the attorney relentlessly, "if I say that your son, who, you claim, died in the war, is today—alive, a thief, a robber, a convict—"

"Object!" shouted the defense attorney angrily.

"Objection sustained!"

Mr. Martin, the prosecuting attorney went on more gently, "if you have lied about the age of your son, you are guilty of perjury."

The spectators was trembling; he half rose to his feet; suddenly he felt the cool hand of his attorney on his cloth. "Clear the court!" cried the judge.

"Just a bunch," said the brilliant attorney later, "of a hillbilly feud in Coon Hollow, and the silliest, kountry kid that ever lived. It looked to me that Mr. Martin Childs was not involved in the case at all. He was merely supplying his only son; we found the sledging buried in the old man's cloth."

"Widow's Mite" Gift Made To Democratic Campaign

A campaign contribution received at Democratic Campaign Headquarters recently is comparable to the "Widow's mite." Long before blind, she makes his living by the sale of pencils, insisted that his donation of one dollar be accepted. He made three similar donations to the headquarters during the past year, primaries.

While Lew's contribution was not large in terms of dollars, it represented a considerable sacrifice for a man whose only source of income is from the sale of pencils. Upon being assured at headquarters that this sentiment behind the contribution was appreciated, Lew insisted that it be accepted as a "back" office.

Lou is widely known here and his friends attest the fact his misfortune has not interfered with his genial, interesting personality. He and other blind leaders throughout the state have been active in organizing the blind in support of Mr. Chandler. They are taking this interest, it was explained, because of "happy" support of legislation in the interest of the blind.

Between the years 1820 and 1931 there were floated in the United States average American city family spends only one-third of its income for food.
