Safety Drivers Law Is Now In Effect In Kentucky

The act which makes automobile drivers responsible for accident judgments against them went into effect Friday, May 15. It is designed to put teeth in safety drivers license law, promote safety and make the reckless and irresponsible more careful. Kentucky is the first state in the A.A.A. Safety-Responsibility group to put it in effect in twenty-eight years and had been active in securing the passage of similar laws in eight other states.

Under the law, which is known as the Safety-Responsibility act, every motorist involved in an accident resulting in death, injury or property damage of $50 or more must report the accident to the Kentucky State Police, Frankfort, June 5, and file proof that he can pay judgments that may be rendered against him. Failure to report the accident will result in the automatic revocation of the driver's license.

Operators of automobiles involved in accidents resulting in death, injury or property damage of $50 or more must furnish evidence that they can pay judgments that may be rendered against them. Failure to furnish such evidence
