AN EDITOR'S RANDOM THOUGHTS

It was Charles Dillingham, as I remember, who invented "editorials." This morning as the purple martins chatter and laugh with that bubbling liquid note which breathes the Spring for those of us who have colonies of these birds, I wish Charles Dilling ham hadn't. For otherwise, I would go a-fishing and idly watch a striped cork bob and listen to the silver arrow of song flung by the meadow lark and mark with eye and ear those signs and portents which signal the near approach of the pilgrim steps of Spring . . . But, alas, I have become used to filling this space with a potpourri of this, that and t'other so that these two wide columns have become the driver and I the driven, when I should prefer to wander through the fields that green mightily these days and go a-questing with mind's eye into the misty haze of past Aprils, green years that have a way of avoiding the penalties of their devil ries. Nancy Byrd Turner's writing some verses in Our Dumb Animals, fashioned an Epitaph on a Dog that will appeal to many who have owned and been loved by some worthless but devoted tail-wagging vagabond:

Here lies at rest, unknown to fame,
Of dirks, descent, and coat of name.
He "thinks." Here he his treasures too—
A ball, a bone, a worried shoe.
Nay, stranger, then no idle tear:
He loved one small lad all his years'.

Back in the days of the horse and buggy a drive to Carlisle from that garden spot of Bourbon county, yclept North Middletown—which a resident once maintained might be proved the center of the world since the sky was seen to "come down" at a point equidistant all around—was not what that drive is today. Up hill and down, behind a fat and well-fed mare who had ideas of her own, it was quite a jaunt and furnished abundant time for roadside observation and quick asides to boy remembered, if one were a child and avid of the strange love of nature that grownups seemed to have. . . . So it is that the memory comes chiefly of stopping near journey's end just at twilight's fall, the summer dust thick at the outskirts of Carlisle and of my father's conversation with a Mr. Garrett. As they talked on I learned that in Mr. Garrett's former home in Virginia John Wilkes Booth had died, that as a small boy he had seen his mother hold the head of the dying actor in her lap, as he lay mortally stricken, and soothe his dying moments. We were not much farther away from the War Between the States at that time than we are today from the World War, not far enough for the bitterness of those who fought for a cause that was lost to have become mellowed into forgetfulness. "Damyankee" still evoked rather hostile images in youthful minds and in many households "Uncle Tom's Cabin" was a forbidden book—I am still unreconstructed enough to believe with good reason. So it was that I came close to one who had seen the bitter death of the distinguished and perhaps demented master of Shakespearean roles a few hours after he had slain, in a box at Ford's Theatre in Washington, that kindly man in whose rugged countenance is reflected the sorrows of a gentle nature torn by the horrors of a conflict of brothers. "Sic semper tyrannis!" Booth had shouted, still the tragedian as he rushed from the stage to trip over a flag. Fracture his leg and so rush crippled to his eternal doom . . . "Such a pity." I remember my father said, as we drove on to our journey's end. "Abraham Lincoln was of us—born here. He was the best friend the South had in Washington." I remember that I was puzzled by my father's statement. For "old black abolitionist" was an epithet all too frequently applied in those days. Men who had ridden with Morgan and had followed Lee in Virginia were yet in the prime of life and all too conscious of the bitterness of defeat. . . . And so it all came back to me this morning as I read a letter from Ernest G. Garrett, of Richmond, Virginia, telling of the death of his father Robert C. Garrett, he who as a little lad saw John Wilkes Booth die. In his letter Mr. Garrett writes:

"April 13th marks the passing of the last survivor of the family in whose home John Wilkes Booth was carried and died, after that stirring chapter in American history which started seventy-two years ago (April 14) when Abraham Lincoln was fatally wounded by an assassin in Ford's Theatre.

"I refer to my father, who as a boy of seven saw Booth die on the porch of his father's home near Port Royal, Virginia.

"Awakening in a room lit by flames of the burning barn, a child's childish terror thinking the end of the world had come, he hastened down stairs just as the soldiers were bringing the wounded man to this house, where they had him across the doorway, while he murmured in a dying whisper, 'Tell my mother.'

"My father's story of this tragedy was very interesting. He told of how his older brothers were carried to Washington as possible suspects of their long imprisonment and of how the Federal Govern ment never paid for the destroyed barn.

"The older residents of Nicholas county will remember my Father well, as he lived there thirty years ago. My mother died just six months ago and I believe that breaking over her loss hastened his end.

Mr. Garrett enclosed a clipping from the Richmond News-Leader from which the following is reprinted:

"In an interview given The News Leader on April 14, 1930, Mr. Garrett stated that at the time of Booth's death, he himself was a boy 7 years of age. The tragic occurrence was indelibly impressed on his mind and he was convinced that the man whom he had seen dying at his family home was none other than the assassin of President Lincoln.

"The former Garrett home in Caroline County long ago passed from the possession of that family and the lonely farm house, fast falling into decay, is located about a quarter of a mile back from a narrow road leading from the Rappahannock River to Bowling Green.

"A depression in the ground in all that now indicates the former site of the old barn in which Booth was found and shot. It was on a straw mattress placed at the door of the farm house, that Booth died.

"In his interview of seven years ago, Mr. Garrett recalled how Booth and his companions arrived at his father's home about ten days after the fatal shooting of President Lincoln. Being back in the country, the Garrett family had not at that time heard of the President's death.

"Mr. Garrett also said: 'My father, R. C. Garrett, was a very hospitable man and no one was ever turned from our door. When Booth rode up and his name by which Booth was known to Mr. Garrett) requested that he be given shelter, he was told that he might spend the night while his companions went ahead to get transportation for him.'

"As to the later events and the death of Booth, Mr. Garrett recalled that 'the soldiers had spread out, and had the place surrounded. They closed in on the barn and called on Booth to come out and surrender.'

"He said also in his interview that 'Booth again called for the troops to give him a fighting chance. He could be seen through the cracks in the tobacco barn on his crutches. There was a shot and he fell. Captain Baker rushed in and pulled him out of the burning barn. He was carried to the porch where he died after the doctor from Port Royal arrived, but was never clearly conscious." •

These days, when sheep raisers have declared war in earnest and with sufficient reason—on roving dogs and when every homeless or lost cur is eyed suspiciously, it is well to remember that there are dogs and dogs, just as there are good men and evil men. The only difference is that bad dogs usually meet a bloody death and evil men, while they may have a way of avoiding the penalties of their devilries, have a way of dying peacefully in their beds. In Our Dumb Animals, fashioned an Epitaph on a Dog that will appeal to many who have owned and been loved by some worthless but devoted tail-wagging vagabond:

Here lies at rest, unknown to fame,
Of dirks, descent, and coat of name.

The late James Lane Allen graduated in the class of '72 at old Kentucky University, now Transylvania, and some years ago the editors of the Transylvanian, the college literary magazine, asked for a contribution from him for the June issue. We ran across Mr. Allen's reply in an old file of the paper and the perfection of its prose is so delightful to us that we know you will enjoy it again with us:

"You ask me for a message, as a memory of my youth to your youth.

"If I could suddenly appear among you as I was in my youth, I should be one of you and none of you would find me unfamiliar to your selves. Youth is invariably youth. Through the irregular human ages little change. The spring time is ever the earth's springtime. What has been planted at each succeeding spring—that is the difference.

"This is what places my youth so far from yours. What was planted in mine was things taught me at college and by the world—is so unlike what is being planted in yours—the things taught you at college and by the world—that my youth and your youth can exchange no messages; they greet as strangers.

"What I harvested in college, what you harvest in college, two bundles of grain laid side by side—how could they have been grown in the same field—youth? Yet they were. And youth, forever changing, forever changeless, is the same. The great Sower we call Nature or call God has other seed for each generation and what each reaps makes it alien to the rest."

Waneeta Beckley, 14, seventh grade student in a Louisville Catholic school, won the State spelling championship Thursday by correctly spelling "venotaph" in the state spelling bee sponsored by the Courier-Journal.—News Brief in Today's Mercury.

No need these times, it would seem, for little maids to apologize with downcast eyes for having turned down their best fellows. Time was when

"I'm sorry that I spelt the word:
I hate to go above you!"

had meaning but that was in the days of the Blue Back Speller and McGuffey. In these piping times the apparently finds few of the masculine gender to "go above" in practicing the gentle—and one fears—the lost art of orthography. Perhaps the males have had to give up, as they have in the case of their last stronghold, the barber shop. But, on the other hand, were they of the masculine gender who gathered in the old spelling classes, reciting the thrill out of standing up before a roomful of people and chanting the syllables of "incomprehensibility" clinotype operator have a care with that word!) that, apparently was enjoyed by the be whiskered ones who spoked with grace, certitude and the staccato rattle of musketry fire. Those of us of the confining pants and overgrown feet

. . . stood a spell on one foot fust.
Then stood a spell on t'other
And on which one he felt the wust
He couldn' ha'told ye nuther.

Oh well, times change, but human nature never does and girls of the gay nineties were not different from boys and girls of today. They made the poor lads spell in the era of the horse and buggy and Spencerian script. But now, what's the use. When John Jones dictates to Susie Smith, who bears the burden of poor orthography, we ask you? And when the aforesaid Jones signs his name so it is unreadable and the only clue to Susie's identity is John's either, for that matter, is found in the J as down on the left hand corner; and to further clear everyone's skirts of breeches he marks it "dictated but not read," why learn to spell? That is, unless you are ambitious to become a proof reader. And I tell you, with regret, gentle reader, that proof readers are born, not made.

SEASONED LEGISLATOR

(Cynthiana Democrat)

From here it looks as though The Democrat has been alone in its desire to reveal, in a sensational manner, a man of high character, independent thought, mature judgment, who in previous legislative service proved to be cautious and with the bettering of state conditions. If this evidence could be presented to the voters of the race for state senator, Harrison county citizens, as well as all other counties in the senatorial district's affairs will be in good hands. We refer to Dr. Reynolds. We don't know his initials; who has ably served his county as representative but was also this district's senator for one term, and made a creditable record. It was so good that the late J. M. Allen attempted to have the rotation rule abrogated in order that Dr. Reynolds could be reelected, and he refused to offer himself for the place a second time.

There has been no indication he would make the race this time as he is busy building up a large practice and it would be quite a sacrifice for him to devote time to the duties of a senator. If he can be persuaded to make the race the district will be well served.

IT WILL PLEASE

(Lancaster Central Record)

For a decade political candidates for state offices have talked about the state debt, promises have been made to stop its increases and some have gone so far as to promise to pay it. When Gov. Chandler took charge the governor's hat ground to be what it was when he was inaugurated at $36,000,000. The present governor's assurance was that his administration would live within its budget, that he would not add to the debt before Gov. Chandler holds the administration over to his successor. Of course, it takes taxation to raise the funds to carry on this expensive government and pay off a big debt, but those who are prone to complain should remember that incompetent, careless, extravagant administrations create debts and when prudent, efficient administrations undertake to pay them taxpayers feel it unless you are ambitious to become a proof and criticise. Even those who are a part of the money spending administrations and produce the debt sometimes talk in the most critical terms. There are for so many job holders at this time in the state administration that a special session would be necessary to add extravagance has been put over. The people are now having a real business administration and they feel sound of the crying the people will not overlook it.

THE COWBOY

Within the last few years, since the radio has assumed the role of one of the necessities in the average household, the cowboy has staged a comeback comparable with his revival a few years earlier in the movies. The actual cowboy as an institution started down hill many years ago, with the passing of free land and the making of fences on the plains. In his own time he acquired a picturesqueness that was not wholly due to his being such a prominent feature of the Wild West Circus. By the time he became a part of the circus he was already known far and wide, a unique character who represented to thousands the very essence of romance. Cowboy songs, such as Barry Mc Nor on the Lone Prairie," were known quite as well east of the Mississippi as in actual cowboy country. Travelers to the West brought back Texas saddles, long cowhorns, and fantastic stories of cowboy life. The ballad-singers and fiddlers lent their aid in making the cowboy a part of our folk music. There has probably been no other year since the opening of the West when it would have been possible to see a northern at any typical country-court gathering in Kentucky as during the fifty states. Even the smallest boys have designs on a pair of Texas saddle.

During the heyday of the circus and the early forms of moving pictures the cowboy was effective literally as a picture-book image of the West. The radio and the talking picture have given the cowboy song, long known and loved by plain people before these inventions were made. Actual cowboy songs appear on many programs. "Roll On, Little Dogies," "Whoopee ti yi yo, Get Along Little Dogies," and the like. Very rapidly there have grown up cowboy songs based on these genuine cowboy ballads, so that it is already pretty hard to tell the one from the other. The way in which a cowboy song is given makes it effective or not, a too melodious rendition as if it were an extract from grand opera, is too much. There should be enough freedom in a cowboy song to suggest, at least, something of the crude but genuine music of the cowlands. By a process of selection and combination a musician has brought much of the spirit of cowboy songs into "I'm Heading for the Last Roundup." A casual turning through Dr. John A. Lomax's Cowboy Songs and Ballads, a collection of genuine songs made by the author some thirty years ago, will show that this now popular song echoes three well-known cowboy classics: Home, Old Paint, I'm Leaving Cheyenne." "Get Along Little Dogies," and "The Great Round-up." The cowboy's sense of walls, resembling the "hollers" of the Kentucky mountains, appear in many of the actual and artificial songs.

The actual and the literary cowboy have become so confused that it is difficult to distinguish between Will James and Rogers and Theodore Roosevelt are equally valid cowboys. Will Rogers for many years combined the achievements of the cowboy and the rustic philosopher and was about as typical a product of the frontier as a person can imagine. How long the cowboy will outlast the range there is no way of knowing, but right now he is one of the best-known and best-liked folk types and is acquiring permanence in song and story.

Neighbors' Day In Kentucky Sunday Schools

Sponsored by the Kentucky Sunday School Association, a special series of Sunday School Days is now being observed. April 11th was "Family Day," April 18th was "Friends' Day" and April 25th will be "Neighbors' Day."

The men of the Methodist churches in Louisville are reporting these special days and the report for the first Sunday, from only 11 churches, shows an increase of 915 over the corresponding day last year.

Several years ago when "Neighbors' Day" was observed by the Sunday schools of Kentucky, many people proved themselves to be real neighbors. In one town three neighbors got together and planned to have everyone in their neighborhood in Sunday school that day. They prepared a pledge to be signed by all who would help make up the Neighbors' Day crowd on the appointed Sunday. With this pledge they visited every home in their square to get signatures and they came very near getting one hundred per cent to promise. Next they painted signs reading "We are going to Sunday School and bring them all the front doors.

When Sunday arrived the committee was active in seeing that all the people were awake early, and preparations were made to get them all, old and young—even the babies—ready to go to Sunday schools. It was a great day. One thing about it was that many of those who entered the spirit enjoyed it so much they became regular members of the Sunday school.

Another "Neighbors' Day" is coming. It will be April 25th. In many parts of Kentucky there will be large numbers of neighbors in the Sunday schools that day.

This series of special Sundays is culminating in the Go-to-Sunday School Day, May 2nd, which is expected to be the biggest day of the series.

Woman Tells Of Murder Committed 24 Years Ago

A mountain woman who remained silent for 24 years told her story of a homicide and tragedy and brought announcement of extradition proceedings in Hardin who will be sought on murder charges.

A Martin county grand jury indicted Hardin, now "somewhere in the West," on a charge of killing wealthy James A. Watterson, in April 1913.

Commonwealth Attorney J. L. Harrington said that Mrs. Nola Runyon Harless, 31, came from her home in the hills to appear before the grand jury at Inez in another case and liber told the jury she saw Hardin, entering a room in Watterson's room at the lonely lumber camp on April 5, 1913.

The next day Watterson's body was found. Dr. J. F. Bailey said at that time pronounced death due to a heart ailment.

Mrs. Harless—Viola Runyon—was seven years old at the time. She was not called at the inquest.

Watterson had gone to the camp, against the advice of his physician, to pay employees. Mrs. Harless' mother was cook. Viola occupied the same room as the lumberman.

Judge J. F. Bailey ordered exhumation of the body and Harrington asserted Watterson had been shot through the head.

The prosecutor did not disclose Hardin's whereabouts, but said he was in the West. Harrington said he hoped to return Hardin for the August term of court.

Mrs. Harless told the prosecutor she had not previously related events of the tragic night because "I wasn't asked."

1937 Ford V-8

● If you think that "all low-price cars cost about the same"—forget it! They don't.

Ford makes a car — a 60-horsepower economy Ford V-8 — that sells from 30 to 60 dollars under the prices asked for any other car of comparable size. The lowest Ford prices in years!

Check delivered prices in your town and see for yourself.

● Of course, first cost doesn't prove "low cost" — you must consider operating cost also.

The "60" has definitely established itself as the most economical car in Ford history. Ford cars have been famous for economy for 34 years, so that means something!

Owners who have driven it thousands of miles report that the Ford "60" averages between 22 and 27 miles on a gallon of gasoline.

You can prove those figures — on the open road — in a car provided by the nearest Ford dealer.

● When you've finished your personal check-up, ask yourself:

"Do I want to save money the day I buy my car and every mile I drive it?"

A damp sponge . . . all that is necessary to keep HANNA'S

SATIN SHEEN

Semi-Gloss Wall Finish

beautiful and new looking

It is not necessary to redecorate your walls every year or so if they are finished with HANNA'S SATIN SHEEN. This semi-gloss wall finish is a hard surface which means not only greater service but also greater ease in keeping the walls clean.

A damp sponge removes dirt, grease and finger marks, making the walls as beautiful and fresh looking as the day Satin Sheen was applied.

Satin Sheen is easy to apply and dries in a few hours.
