Little Women.

Five smart girls, worth all of a million dollars, all down to their fourth birthday party next week —with the world as their unseen guest.

Now when Yvonne, Annette, Cecile, Emilie, and Marie, blow out the shining candles on their cake, for what will they wish?

A shiny new velocipede? To have a lot of money? To be famous when they grow up?

How long, we wonder, will it be before these five little girls suddenly discover they are world-famous? Didn't some 25 million persons listen in to their last birthday party? And in one month alone last year, didn't 18,000 persons hustle out to their nursery near Callander, Ont., to see them put on their "two-day" performance?

And how long also will it be, we wonder, before someone comes forth with a book entitled "Little Women in Business," and dedicated to Miles Dionne? For these five smart girls are in business, big business, right up to their little arms!

No less than twenty-four advertising, moving picture and industrial firms have contracts with them, pouring thousands of dollars daily into the quintuplets' bank account.

As one of Canada's important tourist attractions, they have proved both a boon and a bane to the Dominion.

When the quints, as five of the richest little girls in the world, dive into their fourth birthday cake next week they'll come pretty close to proving that you can both eat your cake and have it too. Which is an extremely rare occurrence—but so, for that matter, are quintuplets!

Our "Small Towns."

Years ago, when industry began to boom for the American citizen, thousands of rural lads and lassies flocked to the cities to seek their fortunes—if any were there—and often to ruin their destinies in one form or another.

The city's advantages held a terrific magnetism for these youngsters, who thought they were tired to death of "small towns" and their "old ways."

Too often the lads and lassies trekked homeward, broken financially, mentally whipped and and physically deteriorated by the change in atmosphere and food.

They thought they were coming home because they were failures. But they really returned—albeit slowly and hesitantly—because they subconsciously realized the boom of the rural community's doom had set in.

Living with a people that take seriously their God and who go to Him in times of stress instead of cursing His hand in the twisted tangle of their lives, is living as it should be. In the smaller communities where God is a reality, a living, breathing entity, instead of an excuse to wear a new hat to church, people are friendly all around, more honest, more charitable, more loving and more neighborly.

Religion oftentimes is forced down the throats of the masses but seldom, if ever, is that true in a small town. People are raised to know He is the ultimate sanctuary and with this unswerving belief they go the course of their lives avoiding tremendous pitfalls that beset and ensnare the ungodly.

A scientist, who acquitted himself nobly and earned a reputation as a "fearless thinker" by telling the world what it already had long considered its purpose and now was on the wane, should have visited any small church in any town on Sunday. The rows of automobiles in front, the hurry of some from the parishioners, the decently bowed heads, would have been more testimony to his error and cast his lie in his face.

Which is exactly by war and struggle, there is only one remedy—Know God, and you do not need to be afraid. All the psychologists and their psychological tomes, coupled with scientific and allied persons' theories, can never approach nor take the simple philosophy of Christ who said "love thy neighbor as thyself."

Remember then, that when the world totters on the brink of destruction brought about by the selfish, it will be a godly man, a true Christian, who will save it. It happened once before.

The Right To Life.

Once more the right to life has triumphed.

Through the dramatic story of little Helaine Colan has run that theme—the right to life, a right which has triumphed over the fear of eternal blindness.

It is easy to understand the parents' first decision. The baby is young as to be almost before life, faced death or a life of darkness. Then the parents, the pleas of those long years of sightless-ness must have seemed more painful than the thought of immediate death.

But one can also understand the decision of the jury. Those jurymen who voted for life at any cost were moved by the oldest of human forces—the right to life. Physicians and rabbis, they had dedicated their lives to that right. They could reach only one decision—to do all in their power to save the young life in their hands.

And so little Helaine goes on to face the battle of life, a battle now complicated by her handicap. But who can tell? Perhaps from that fund of money may come great discoveries that will help many other persons listen in to their last birthday party? And in one month alone last year, didn't 18,000 persons hustle out to their nursery near Callander, Ont., to see them put on their "two-day" performance?

And how long also will it be, we wonder, before someone comes forth with a book entitled "Little Women in Business," and dedicated to Miles Dionne? For these five smart girls are in business, big business, right up to their little arms!

It's The Law Here.

Voltaire, the great French writer, in a moment of genius, wrote a phrase that has become the working motto of all democracies: "I disagree with what you say but will defend to the death your right to say it."

In our country, we think nothing of giving vent to our opinions on anything, regardless of its scope in national affairs. That personal privilege is insured by one of the Constitution is remarkable in view of the fact that in Europe, in nearly all its countries, such procedure is reversed entirely.

Go into Germany and say you do not like Hitler's methods against the Jews, go into Russia and comment on the inefficiency of its industries, or enter Italy and vilify the censorship of the press.

The chances of your escaping without official action is one in a thousand; if you are a native, the best to hope for is a concentration camp.

Oftentimes, the least obvious privilege is the most obvious boon. Suppose you couldn't say what you thought your taxes were too high; do you think you could stomach it?

Not at all. Therefore, if the time comes that we "forget" we can defend the right of you and your neighbor to complain at injustices.

It is commendable that the American race, sturdy, democratic and free, would support such a right as that to give a war of democracy against dictatorship never comes. But it may.

To The Youngsters From Their Parents.

In the words of the dour Scots, "be ye man or woman a lot better worthy of the days as Carlisle High School's 1938 graduates take their sheepskins and confront the world.

We all love our youngsters. To us, growing older and graver perhaps, they are our reflection. They are all that we would be if we could start life over and will be all we wish we had been.

Fresh, clean faced, restful, and unmarred by the years ahead, would that we, their elders, could take the journey with them.

Our advice is cheap. All of it is. But we shall pray that you will among other things:

Keep your faith in God, the faith that we elders have for so long instilled into you. Through God, comes the greatest power, the most true glory, the divinest inspiration.

Keep your faith in yourselves. No man or woman is a lot better worthy with the usual thoughts of himself.

Keep your faith in mankind. For every man in your way that is out to do you harm or wrong, there are three who will be there to do your right. Most of the apples in the barrel may be spoiled but there are quite a few which are presentable.

Keep your faith in the cardinal virtues. Honesty, industry, cleanliness, all are attributes without which a man cannot stay at the top long. Remember, he may get there without them, but staying is a different matter and it always is necessity, industry or cleanliness that disposes him at this time.

Lastly, keep your faith in your friends with whom you played as a child or with whom you associated at other phases of your life. It is a platitude to say it, but bear in mind that by remembering their shortcomings, helping them over the rough weeds, lending them your sympathy, it will eventually come home to you in some form or another.

CAPITOL COMMENTS

The Special Session Chandler-Wallis bill to revolutionize care of the mentally ill is being debated in the battle halls at Frankfort. The bill provides modern methods of treating mental diseases and initiates a system of mental hygiene, as a public health service. One of the most important features provides that the council of the Kentucky State Medical Association can protect the personnel and administratives officials, from political interference. The outstanding features of the bill provides securing of qualified specialists in mental diseases for the state hospital staffs. The establishment of a system of mental hygiene, in cooperation with the public health service, making possible early treatment and cure of mental diseases. Professional qualifications are required for technical members of the staffs of the state hospitals. The administration of the division of hospitals and mental hygiene, is to be appointed by the Commissioner of welfare, from a list recommended by the Council of the State Medical Association. The director is to be in complete charge of the division and cannot be removed, except upon written charges sustained by a committee composed of the Governor, the Commissioner of Welfare, and a member named by the Council of the Medical Association.

Under the bill, the staff of each state hospital must include besides the superintendents, a business manager, clinical director, pathologist, and a Director of Supervisor of Nurses, Field Liaison Officer, Dentist, Social and Junior Physicians. The authorized personnel is one physician for every 150 patients with a minimum of one to every 300, and one attendant for every 6 patients with a minimum of one to every twelve. The clerical personnel to inmates in the Institution for Feeble-minded children is optional. But a Director of Education is provided.

The Director of the Division will have supervision of other institutions receiving aid from the state and give service to the prisons. He may utilize Public Health and Welfare Department Social Workers in the general field of mental hygiene.

The bill requires psychiatric examination of all persons indicted for a capital offense or habitual criminals.

An individual is permitted to have his mental illness treated without being convicted of insanity, as if it were a crime, but must bear the cost of this treatment not in the case of pauper patients.

An important feature of this bill takes the personnel of the institution out of the political range class and will allow a permanent staff of experienced and qualified specialists to give aid and care for the mentally ill.

The bill contains humanitarian features that provide for systematic treatment and probable cure of all mentally ill patients, in State Institutions, not merely for confinement in the asylums. The division in cooperation with the State Department of Health will develop a state-wide mental hygiene program looking toward the prevention of mental disease.

By Hugo Eckener, bellowing for helium supplies Germans must float their dirigibles easily by rigging an attachment to their swastika emblems and the ship for the hot air.

What's nice about using Der Fuehrer is that that kind of air is extremely cheap.

But the rub is the Germans, when they inflate the dirigible, might be confused and couldn't tell the Hitler gasbag from the real gasbag.

"Der Fuehrer" takes on new interpretations. Americans say "der fuehrer like Hitler, the better."

Hitler says the downtrodden Jews are "free and happy, and can go anywhere they please." That's like locking a man in a cell and saying to him "go anywhere you like."

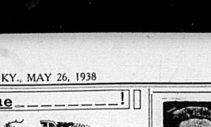
Did you know Hitler's real name is Adolf Shickelgruber? Well, if you didn't, you're like him; he's trying his best to forget it, too.

Incidentally, Mr. Schickelgruber says he is not accountable to anyone on this earth for his actions. Who said anything about that? We all wait with pleasure the time when he meets The Highest Judge and enters his lookers plea for the mercy he refused to grant those of this life.

part of his earnings for a bank account, and gave a similar amount each week to a deserving charity.

We wish you godspeed in your chosen paths and hope that we, your parents, will be able to assist you in your destinies.

But It's True



Some 500,000 years ago the Hudson river found its mouth a hundred miles south of New York, in what is now the Atlantic ocean. The end of the river came suddenly, in the form of the most tremendous waterfall ever known, so far as geologists are able to determine.

Twenty-three years ago Miss Annett suffered a broken neck in an accident on the New York, New Haven & Hartford railroad. It was believed she would live only a short while, and the railroad company agreed to pay her $200 a month until her death. She's still alive, but can move about only in a wheelchair. Recently the railroad petitioned a court to be relieved of this injury settlement.

TYPOGRAPHICAL ERRORS

(Springfield Sun)

In rambling through ancient files of the Sun, we took time to peruse pleasant and interesting, we were surprised to find that editors of a half-century ago also were troubled with typographical errors, a fact attested by the following editorial comment by Gen. W. W. Greene, editor of The Washington County Leader.

"You sometimes wonder why newspaper men occasionally give way to passion; you think it strange that they could not preach be in the angelic mood in which editors ought to be, and, if you were to write. 'Her dainty feet were encased in satin slippers that were fashioned for Titania's fairy boots' and have your compositor substitute some brawny, rhetoric into 'Her dirty feet were encased in coarse cowhide that might have served for Titania's ferry boats,' wouldn't your amiability undergo a decided change? Such changes are you, too would break out of the mere if someone should tell them how. He decided that his proper mood is the angelic.

So a long, unspectacular and laborious campaign was begun. First, the newspaper stressed the value of irrigation. It agitated, campaigned and educated; and after some three years, brought about the construction of some 500 irrigation projects which helped turn sun-baked fields into green and fertile producers again.

But that was only a part of it.

There was a campaign to restore abandoned lands to the range; a drive for the construction of innumerable small dams to conserve water; a shelter-belt program; a range of education in scientific farming practices such as contour plowing and crop diversification, and a campaign to aid the farmers.

As a result of all of this, the area which looked done for a few years ago is now getting back on its feet again—and, which is important, getting there by its own efforts and not by help from above.

Now there is a genuine specimen of the "romance" of the newspaper business. It isn't the sort of romance you read about. There are no picturesque reporters in it, no hard-boiled editors, no dauntless seekers after scoops. It is simply a story of a long, thankless campaign to make a region a better place to live in; as such, it is worth a dozen of the old blood-and-thunder, get-the-news-at-all-costs yarns.

NEWSPAPER OFFICE YIELDS ROMANCE

(Ashland Daily Independent)

A great deal of nonsense has been printed at one time or another about the romance of newspaper publishing. The late Richard Harding Davis down to the era of "The Front Page," the newspaperman has been held up as a chap who moves through an atmosphere of romance, slightly smudged and soiled aura, occasionally, but romance nonetheless.

At least 90 per cent of this is pure bokum. Yet there is a romance in the business, as there is in all trades and callings; but there is nothing spectacular about it, and it is only rarely that the man in the street is able to get a look at it.

SHAVE AND A HAIRCUT, SHAMPOO

Barber shops and beauty parlors are now in every town, so many of them that everybody has a chance to get prettied up. But it used to be otherwise. Ready money for such things was not to be found. When we were little our mothers—or big sisters put an apron over our lips and shortened us, maybe not very artistically but sufficiently, anyway. At the we felt rather big for very little children, boys and girls alike, did not have their hair cut. Boys wore long hair until they were nearly big enough to start to school and I remember one boy in school with his hair in plaits. After a fellow got big enough to have suggestions of a change of voice, he resented being shorn by the homefolk. Nearly every neighborhood had a boy or man who gave his services free to help heads look less like bushel baskets. To him we all repaired on Saturday afternoons, just before we started to the creek for our weekly bath. His scissors may not have been very sharp, he may not have had any artistic touch in haircutter, but was, always felt, the best person in all the world we could use his services. If he clipped a few places too close to the ear, he apologized to all comers that we had been through a terrible ordeal and deserved his respect. In general the events of English novels seem tame to me, but when Thomas Hardy, in The Return Of The Native, mentions his hero's shaving day, and men got their haircuts and beards trimmed, I feel that he and I could have sent many a pint together.

In general the neck was left unshaven when the hair was cut. Some people then and now feared that shaving rather than clipping would make the neck hair grow coarse and abundant, as if a hair could tell whether it was cut with shears or a razor. Nearly every year or so there would come a crate for clipped or shaved heads. Most of the boys who submitted to this ordeal wanted to hide out for a week or two afterwards, however funny it may have seemed at the time. Once and only once I had my hair clipped. The result was not very pleasing. The next Sunday I came into Sunday school late and sheepishly. The choir had already gathered around the new organ and started a hymn. A solemn hush fell on the whole congregation, followed by what was, in spite of efforts to stifle it, unmistakable laughter, and in church, too. It was a wonder I was not fined for disturbing public worship.

The neighborhood barber often had to trim a boy, too. Nearly every evening shaved his temples during the hot months but allowed the sideburns to grow out during the winter. There was a great deal of pride in this winter growth out of the way. Mustaches were seldom trimmed, the more walrus-like the better, for the time.

Of course in barber, local gossip was exchanged, and the Ku Klux Klan was born. The tin washpan or the creek served as baptismal font. Plain creek water and big Deal soap can raise enough suds to baptize a whole family.

There was something about the barber shop that was wonderful meaning that women were not welcome when the community was in session. The wife, Victorianism forbade that. It was bad enough for the men folks to cut the hair of little boys, but to let a woman in on the secret would go. What would those old fashioned ones say now if they could see our barber shops and beauty parlors?

YOU PAID THE BILL

(Louisville Courier-Journal)

If you live in the United States, here is what Crime cost you last year:

More than you spent for cigarettes.

More than you probably spent on clothes.

More than you spent for food during a three months period.

More than you spent at the local soda fountain.

It makes no difference whether you are a man, a woman or a child. Crime last year cost you almost the unbelievable sum of $120

And a contributing factor to the high price you paid, according to charges made recently by Dr. Edgar Hoover, head of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, is the nation's grade system. Criminals may be handled in different manners by different judges, but the actual result is the same. Both the criminal and the public are turned loose upon society by the turn of their respective wheels.

And Mr. Hoover has facts to prove his charges.

Last year the Federal Bureau of Investigation added to the criminal histories of 529,155 persons, after fingerprinting them and checking with the files. Of this number 149,091 possessed previous criminal histories. Of these 15,002 were subsequently confirmed criminals.

Here is the last group that Mr. Hoover finds his most serious charge against the parole system. Of this group, 4,251 were convicted criminal group had been recipients of the privilege of suspended sentence, of parole, and even, in some cases, ten times.

The chief of the G-Men directly charges venal politicians with contributing to the crime problem by their methods of discharging honest police officials. He asserts, and rightly so, that police offices should be awarded upon a professional merit system.

An indifferent public, Mr. Hoover declares, is responsible for a great deal of the present confusion of the parole laxity.

There is a serious problem.

It becomes serious when we learn that Crime has cost us the exorbitant sum that it has in the course of a year's time, and when the blame is pointed directly at our system of setting free a group of hardened criminals.

Under Kentucky law, a prisoner is eligible for parole when he has served one-half of his term, if his term is less than eight years. If he has been sentenced to prison for life, he may be paroled in eight years.

But that is not the evil. No one would deny the necessity of a parole system which keeps the prisons from becoming too congested. That is not what Mr. Hoover means.

The evil is in turning loose upon society men who will again make society their prey. Who is to be paroled is the question, and should be determined only after a careful investigation.

Edgar Hoover Hicks is a case in point. It was Hicks, a paroled convict, who with others perpetrated the horrible "head and hands" murder of a Christian county farmer. Hicks was forced to serve his prison sentence. That ex-convict never should have stained Kentucky's pages.

Buffoons have no luxury when it costs $120 each year.

Governor Chandler On Tour In Purchase

While the Kentucky General Assembly was in extraordinary session this week, passing on the merits of a bill which will assure better personnel, the last word in equipment and housing facilities and better administration in Kentucky hospitals for the insane, Governor A. B. Chandler continued his tour of the state in his own behalf for the nomination for United States Senator.

His tour is carrying him deep into the Purchase where each county is heavily Democratic. He will complete the week- however in Southeastern Kentucky where he is to crown the Queen of the Mountain Laurel Festival at Pineville on Saturday, May 28.

Before going to Pineville Governor Chandler will speak tonight at Paducah, the home town of Alben W. Barkley, his opponent for the Senate nomination. Paducah and Mcklenburg county were strong for Chandler when he made his race for the Governorship in 1935. He likewise visited Graves county where he has a firm following, speaking at Mayfield and other points of that section.

Perhaps the most interesting stand that Governor Chandler will make on his present tour of the state, will be at Hardin on May 30 when he will be the guest of honor of the Hardin county. Although it is generally believed that the coal folk would be against Governor Chandler, a surprise gesture alone serves to discredit this belief to a great extent.

The invitation for Chandler to be present at the Hardin festival was given by William Turnblazer, Master of Dorcas Horton
