Wind Razes Chimney While Council Fiddles

Superior, Wis., (AP)—A high wind did in one minute what the city Council had argued about for several months. The Council wanted to raise an old 160-foot brick chimney, proclaimed to be unsafe. Finally the Council awarded a contract to tear it down. After everything was signed a high wind came along and blew down the chimney.

England's King, Queen May Visit United States

King George VI, and his consort, Queen Elizabeth, will set journey to Canada for a visit to the empire's possession in that hemisphere and may visit the United States before returning. It is announced last week.

The visit is a part of the royal tour to visit the empire possessions as an aftermath to their coronation.

Federal Penalty Is Held Valid On Overseales

Macon, Ga. (AP)—Tobacco farmers who have exceeded marketing quotas may be validly "penalized" under Federal crop marketing provisions, a three-judge Federal Court has ruled.

Judge Bernard H. Sibley of Atlanta said in the opinion that if regulation of marketing of crops is needed, Congress has the authority, and not the States.

The Tobacco Marketing Act, he ruled, deals only with planting and production.

A group of producers brought the suit in the Valdosta, Ga. division of Federal Court against Nat Smith, Agricultural Adjustment Administration official. The United States was permitted to intervene because the 50 per cent penalty tax levied on proceeds in excess of quotas would go to the Secretary of Agriculture.

The court ruled that application of the act was not unconstitutional and dissolved an injunction obtained by growers at the beginning of the 1938 marketing season. It ordered impounded fees to go to the Government.

The growers can appeal the case to the Supreme Court.

Sitting with Judge Sibley were Judge C. B. Rennamer of the Northern Alabama District and Judge Samuel Sconyer of Macon.

The South Georgia tobacco marketing season closed August 26.

Make Use Of All Land Of Your Farm

"Make the most of all the land you have," says D. O. Williams, Camp Superintendent of the soil conservation service area at Carlisle, Kentucky. Many farmers, he points out, are now following a program of careful management in their woodlands that will use the full value of these often neglected areas both for timber production and erosion control.

One sign of a healthy woods, according to Mr. Williams, is a deep layer of leaf litter lying undisturbed between the trees. Another is dense shrubby undergrowth, which flourishes especially near the woodland borders. To preserve these two valuable assets, many farmers in the Carlisle area are protecting their woods against fire and grazing. After having timber cut, they plant trees on land burning, they build fences to prevent livestock from destroying the undergrowth and litter by grazing and trampling.

Another phase of the woodland management program is known as the selective harvest, which consists of treating the trees as a crop almost like corn or wheat. At this time of year, plans for cutting the winter supply of fuel and other timber products are made by designating the straight, healthiest, and most properly spaced trees. These will remain to grow undisturbed, while the crooked, diseased, or improperly spaced trees will be cut for fuel wood or for other purposes. In other words, the stand is thinned to give the most desirable specimens in the very act of harvesting them. Improvement cutting will stimulate the growth of crop trees, produce a valuable yield of timber, and still keep the land protected against erosion.

Pungent Flavors For Rice Dishes

Plain boiled rice served as a starchy dish for dinner needs no introduction in most American homes, but there is room for variety of serving rice and by arranging seasoned dishes of it frequently to vary the menus. It is mostly a matter of changing the flavor by adding a sauce, gravy or a liquid to make it tender, but the rice should not always be water. Cooking it in milk increases the food value of the dish. Cooking it in bouillon makes a delicious rice foundation for a gravy or a stew. Children like their rice cooked in chicken stock "risotto," as they call it. And with some seasoning it makes a delicious chopped ham, peppers, onions and pimiento mixed thru because of the South, a "jambolaya." Any meat stock may be used as the liquid in which to cook rice.

The bland rice is given more piquancy when cooked in a Spanish, a Turkish dish by browning the rice in oil or fat before it is boiled or steamed. Rice cooked tender if it is mixed with chopped onion and fried in butter, seasoning, and baked. In East India rice is often served with a curry sauce which is cooked right in fat and cooked in boiling water or milk. Curry powder is a mixture of powder give it a distinctive flavor.

Canned tomatoes, grated cheese and chopped pimentos are used in a bowl of plain cooked rice to make a complete dish which can also be cooked on top of the stove or baked. Recipes for unusual rice dishes can be found in Farmers' Bulletin 1761, Cooking American Varieties of Rice, published by the U. S. Department of Agriculture, Washington, D. C.

Horse Laugh Is On Flatbush Fire Laddies

New York, (AP)—The laugh that raucous, horsey kind—is on the Flatbush fire ladies in Brooklyn.

A battalion chief, two engine and two hook and ladder companies, two police radio and a fire patrol car all were dispatched to a fire alarm.

They found Mike, a dappled gray milk wagon horse, nonchalantly nosing the fire box handle he'd pulled down—but no fire.

Box With $90,000 Plowed Up By Farmer

Baltimore, (AP)—A Baltimore county farmer plowed his fall garden, unearthed a fortune of some $90,000 in matted, musty paper money in an old tin box, officials of the Federal Reserve Bank here disclosed.

The money was brought to the bank by a lawyer representing the farmer. The names of both were kept confidential by the bank pending settlement of questions of ownership and taxability of the cash.

Those who handled the money said it was so old and so matted together that it was extremely difficult to count. Estimates of the value of the fortune ranged from $90,000 to $100,000.
