Tobacco Program Changed By Four Amendments

Farmers may well permit plenty all the tobacco they produce and they may sell it to whom they please, wherever a marketing agreement may be in effect, in the future, says M. D. Boyer, chairman of the State Agricultural Experiment Station committee. This is a change in the tobacco program, which has been in effect since 1934. Under the present program, tobacco is sold to the government and the government distributes it to the consumer. The new program will allow farmers to sell their tobacco to whom they please, and to sell it in any quantity they wish. The government will still regulate the quantity of tobacco that can be produced, but it will not regulate the price. The government will also regulate the quality of tobacco, but it will not regulate the quantity of tobacco that can be produced.
