EARLY GRAZING IS NEEDED FOR COWS

Fertilizing Small Area Is Found Good Plan.

By R. R. Cox, Extension Agronomist, College of Agriculture and Home Economics, WKU Service.

Of the various measures which may be employed to furnish more and better pasture for a short time, the fertilizing of a small area of the permanent pasture to furnish early spring grazing is one which is adapted to many farms. Although a fairly large quantity of fertilizer is needed per acre, the practice is often used in the long run provided the soil is good. The procedure is as follows:

In early spring apply from 200 to 1,200 pounds to the acre of a high nitrogen mixed fertilizer, such as 8-16-8, 10-6-4 or 5-8-7. An application of lime should also be made if the soil is strongly acid. The area treated should be one acre to five acres. Best results will be obtained if this fertilized area is fenced off from the rest of the pasture. The current grass pasture so treated may be turned on when the grass is four or five inches high, which should be about 10 days in advance of the time the cows are normally turned out on untreated pasture.

This early grazing will save a considerable amount of feed, especially at a time of year when pasture is most welcome to the feed. Aside from the time this treated area is grazed off, the untreated pasture is ready for grazing. After the grazing of the treated area has made a renewal growth, 2,200 pounds to the acre of nitrate of soda should be applied. This will stimulate the grass and prolong the grazing season. Applications of lime should also be made
