THE MASTER LOVED THE COUNTRY

(Winfield S. Hilpp)

He never sojourned in the city,
Though he walked through its streets with pity
For the sad lives of those he met
As a traveler, teacher and healer
And servant of those He might meet

He pitied its wretched and careworn
Who smothered Hot path every day.
Set apart from the mountain
Wept oft over their sin and decay

But He loved the roadways of the country
And the wide range of mountains and plains.
And He loved more than them the people
Who toiled fields and highways and lanes.

And He preached from texts uncouth and common,
Of the sower, the seed and the soil,
Of grain and vineyards and lilies,
Of the sparrow that none may despise.

Without the Father's care knows not,
Of sermons He preached would awaken
A long thought in His hearers,
Yet hope for millions reclaimed.

For He was a countryside preacher
And His words were like draughts from cool springs,
To the weary who came to sip and rest.
And His texts were the world-growing things.
