Camp Superintendent Tells of Conservation Districts

What are conservation districts? This question, according to D. C. Williams, superintendent of the CCC camp at Carlisle, Kentucky, is being asked by many of our leaf people.

"The answer," Mr. Williams said, "is that soil conservation districts are organized, organized and managed by the federal government, and they have a common land problem which they are working to solve by developing and carrying out a program specifically designed to meet the needs of the lands within the district."

Williams said that in 21 additional conservation districts and 20 additional camps have been established since the CCC was organized in 1933. He said that the CCC has been successful in carrying out its program in many of these districts. He said that the CCC has been successful in carrying out its program in many of these districts.

Farmers File for Conservation Pay

October 15, the first date for performing soil-building projects in the conservation districts, many farmers have asked questions. Mr. Williams pointed out that the CCC has been successful in carrying out its program in many of these districts.
