Dispelling The Fog

By Charles Michelon, Director of Publicity, National Democratic Committee

Adjournment of partisan politics for the period of the present emergency, which has been so generously acted by the outbreak of delegates in European countries, is not the theme of spokesmen of both major parties.

Alfred M. Landon, the most recent of the Republican nominees for the presidency, while indicating his accord with the President's policy of "peace and strict neutrality" act revised or repealed, expresses the thought that his notion of the most important action to keep the country out of war would be for the President to declare that he would not run for re-election. Doubtless all the other active or passive candidates of both parties might agree with the former Kansas Governor in favor of such a declaration form the White House, though they might not agree with Mr. Landon's reason for it.

Most people, I think, would favor the retirement from politics of Mr. Roosevelt, so far from instigating a fervor of partisanship, it would tend to the political flames more than anything else could do. It would indeed be the full fury of compromising efforts of patriotic statesmen and gentlemen. But think what would be the effect of a declaration which is found to be in accord with all serious prospective concerns?

Every one of the opposition's prospects would be to leave a clear course of what he deems expedient for his own re-election and for the benefit of the President's program, or against efforts to frustrate it. Every effort or element dealing with the situation which is for the time being for the best interest of partisanship in order that the country may be presented as united front to the respective belligerents who are vitally concerned in the war theatres abroad.

The uncertainty of the President's attitude would be no uncertainty is as great in my own mind as in that of the next man to some extent, at least, keeps the industrial companies guessing, which makes for consideration of the big issues in a calmer, less prejudiced atmosphere. Incidentally, I think as I stated long ago, that the nation is entitled to know the future events over which the President has control. In other words, he will not take another term unless he has a mind to and I believe it is his fervent hope that that necessity will be averted.

In the controversy over the neutrality process, for the consideration of which Congress has been called back, there is no need for calling names or of ascribing unworthy motives to those who take one position or the other. The President believes that repeal or revision of this act is our best hope for preserving peace. To insist on the retention of the law as it now stands believe that the administration's program involves greater danger of war. To one person or another, for example, to doubt the sincerity of Senator Hiram Johnson's statement that "the repeal of the embargo will mean that this nation is on the road to and one-half out of the war" and his insistence that there be no repeal, than there was to doubt his sincerity when the law was under consideration, or when he voted against the very bill he now insists must be kept on the statute books.

"There is a simple and straightforward course," said the veteran California Senator when he was arguing in the Senate in 1937, "that this nation may take. We can refuse to change existing the law relating to arms, munitions and implements of warfare, and permit our people to trade as usual. That would be subject, of course, to the rules of international law, to search and seizure by belligerents, and to the perils of blockade. Those would be the risks they must take if they desire to trade."

On the same day, Senator Borah, also in opposition, told the Senate "Whatever else we do in this legislation, let us keep unimpaired the right to carry our commerce to whatever part of the world American initiative and American genius may win their way." Undoubtedly Senator Borah was also right in his position in 1937 and ago as he is now in fighting as hard as he can to prevent what he advocated then.

There is nothing either strange or unusual in statesmen changing their viewpoints as conditions change. There was no European war being waged two years ago, or in full swing today. The so-called neutrality law which ties our commercial hands is a measure for the advantage of the totalitarian belligerents, and the disadvantage of the democracies that are fighting them—and to our own confusion.

The new enactment would apparently be to the advantage of the democracies and the disadvantage of the Hitlerite countries, and would maintain our trade and our historic commercial rights.

Whatever course we take is going to help one side and hinder the other, and our relative immunity from or danger of involvement in the European conflict is governed by the same no matter what we do or fail to do.

If it had not been for domestic politics we would have been busy on our historic ground before there was any declaration of war. If it were not for political maneuvering there would be no serious controversy over getting back there now. This does not mean that all of the administration's opponents in this measure are playing politics in a matter of such vital concern for the nation. But there is no question that a vast majority of our people have made up their minds what they want, and that the sincere advocates of the present status constitute only a relatively small minority.

And, incidentally, the question of what party wins the election this month or two months from now ought to be as foreign to the course of legislation in the present session of Congress as the state of the weather on the first Tuesday after the first Monday of November, 1940.

TRUTH about ADVERTISING

By CHARLES B. ROTH

WHEN my mother went overland in a covered wagon to a new home in the West, transportation was slow, was expensive. Prices of everything were high.

She preserved a newspaper of her period on the frontier, and it interests me occasionally to read the current prices of things you buy every day now for a few cents.

Eggs were $2 a dozen in those days. Sugar brought 25 cents a pound. Kerosene was $3 a gallon. Candles cost 25 cents apiece.

Compare these prices with those prices you see advertised in your newspaper today and you will see that, although much talk is bandied back and forth concerning the increased cost of living, the fact is that the cost has gone downward consistently since 1850.

One of the reasons for high prices then was undoubtedly the difficulty with which the supply was obtained—the hazards and expense of transporting goods.

But the chief reason was that the cost of these necessaries could not be spread out over enough people to bring them at lower cost to all. The merchant had to pay the cost of his business out of sales to 62 EGGS comparatively few customers. Costs had to be high.

Prices on everything you buy today, regardless of whether you live in a village or a large city, would be higher now if it were not for the service of advertising in lowering them to your advantage.

As [illegible] as a manufacturer of a merchant begins to advertise he begins to sell more. As he sells more he uses less fees to sell to each customer. He cuts the price. More customers again he is able to cut the price.

Profits soon you have the situation of improved quality and lower prices brought about through the creative service of advertising to the consumer.

Advertising and high prices do not go together at all. They are extremely incompatible to each other. It is only the product which is unadvertised, which has no established market, that costs more than you can afford to pay.

Whenever you go into a store and buy a item of advertised merchandise, it doesn't make any difference what, you are getting more for your money—more in quality and service—than you would get if you spent the same amount for something which was not advertised.

The man who builds a business on advertising can give you more for your money because advertising enables him to give more for less. See how advertising pays you every day.

The Farmers Livestock Company

upon establishing a market in Carlisle second to none in this section of the state.

It's a great thing for Carlisle and still greater for the farmers of Nicholas and adjoining counties, who should appreciate the efforts of the management in providing this excellent market for the disposal of their livestock.

We quote a big buyer, who said: "Carlisle has one of the best markets in the state. We sure have to pay for what we get over there, but it's a clean market, conducted by high class gentlemen, and that's the kind of a market the buyers like to attend."

FAVORITE SEASON

(Chicago Tribune)

How pleasantly comes Autumn to our land!
Not here does it bring dismal fog, cold, rain,
And endless damp, but soft, on every hand,
It strolls approaching down a rainbow lane.

A thousand shades of green the trees reveal,
And many tints of yellow and of gold;
Strange reds and purples, too, that make one feel
As if it were the work of artist bold.

With clear bright blue of summer glows the sky!
Each cloud gay hued blossoms strew the ground;
While fields and orchards smile as passersby!
In all the year could fairer scene be found?

Somewhere the Fall may be a season gay,
A time of melancholy, sad and drear,
Where Summer's end is greeted with dismay,
And doleful, chanting, someone's not here.
