THE "DOCTOR'S WIFE" WRITES

Dear Folks:

As the last grains of sand were sifted with definite precision down the hour-glass that glass of 1939, bells pealed out across the white drifts of snow the message that the year 1940 had been born. As we received with expectant hopeful hearts this brand new year, we found ourselves in the grip of the coldest winter since the memorable year of 1917. Blankets of snow draped majestically over the tall shaggy mountains to the heart of Kentucky's bluegrass. Every nook and corner seemed an embodiment of the beautiful snow scenes painted across the Christmas cards our friends so thoughtfully sent us. But all this winter is not beautiful. The doctor came to my home during a terrible storm early this morning, and his experiences of the night brought me face to face with some of the dangers of this picturesque season. Tired and disheveled, he trudged his way to the cheerful open fire in his office. I waited, wanting to hear what was nearest his heart today. I knew that, by keeping quiet, I would finally know what was uppermost in his mind, and sure enough, as I helped him with his coat and leggings, he said:

"I've had a touch of the cold. The illness experienced at this time of year could be avoided if folks had a reasonable appreciation of the dangers of exposure. The marked changes in temperature, ranging from approximately sixty degrees to twenty during the winter season, require careful planning as to the type of clothing to be worn. Many people disregard thermometer readings entirely and rely upon sunlight as a yles. Unfortunately, a number of serious illnesses can be directly traced to carelessness in the matter of winter clothing. Always be overcoat for cold days and lightweight apparel for warm days. Children should be an unbroken rule. Many pneumonia cases and other illness by being overclad rather than underclad. It is a matter of whether of fur or of wool, warm underwear is always essential. Fully particular to keep the feet dry; one is walking is likely to develop colds and influenza. Rubbers should be worn in wet weather. Gloves make one prettier. The mittens are warmer. Avoid sudden chilling of the body by removing outer garments when entering warm places. Keep a warm scarf handy to protect the throat and lungs against infection. The most important thing to remember is that the body must be kept dry. Perspiration should be checked by proper clothing and fuel in Kentucky.

"There is no need for folks unduly to fear the winter season. Even an irrational viewpoint toward the cold is startling in a way that makes it a wise to be reasonably active to keep warm and usually one will not be seriously harmed by the weather of the day. Moderation in style is to controlling factor.

"You can see when movements are covered with clothing it would be advisable for everyone to know how to dress. Many people wear footwear does not afford adequate protection from the cold, damp and chilly conditions. To prevent this fact would be most thoughtful. Any type of footwear that may result therefrom should be used. Overshoes should be used to protect the feet. Rubbers are the rule of thumb.

"Another consideration because of more usually construction and wear, appropriateness of clothing does not call for as close attention to detail as in the summer season. The fact as does the feminine shoe. It usually there are a number of days throughout the winter season when use of overshoes from a body's standpoint is not necessary, frequently this fact is overlooked by many women.

"While style and custom indicate in general, the type of clothing should be worn, the body requires, in winter time its adaptation by the individual should be sufficiently flexible and sensible to maintain health.

One winter I was worried about the little girls wearing short socks, dresses, and short coats, but the stylists took care of that; snow suits appeared to keep them warm.

And then the spell was broken. He began to refill his bag. I went hurriedly to the kitchen to prepare his midday breakfast. The talk before the fire had given me a deep impression upon me, and, as I hurried about, I thought deeply down from the hour glass of 1940, and I resolved to pay more attention to changes in the weather and dress accordingly. I hope you'll do the same.

Yours for good health,

The Doctor's Wife.

Ruffed Grouse

The ruffed grouse, locally known as pheasant, is one of the finest game birds that ever lived in our state. The drumming of the male during the period of courtship in the spring was a common wood sound of pioneer days. Now we hear the drumming of the grouse in our state may consider himself fortunate. Should anyone miss this device as his ear is quite far out of range of the only as a warning to other males that a female is near, a method of attraction for the female. It is an old misconception not to be found many times each day. It is not a love song, but a challenge to other males. The drumming is done by the male standing on a log or rock, with tail spread and wings beating rapidly against his sides. The sound is made by the wings striking the air. The sound is produced by the wings striking the air. The sound is made by the wings striking the air. The sound is made by the wings striking the air. The sound is made
