Tidbits Of Kentucky Folklore

By Dr. Gordon Wilson

Looking Like A Mexican

Many of the customs that have passed away are to be greatly mourned, for they have left no adequate successors. On the other hand, some of the passing institutions should have our farewell blessings. I can think of nothing that has changed more within my lifetime than the mexican's attitude toward himself and the very similar attitude of people toward him. Frankly, I like the newer attitudes better.

Formerly a musician was made to feel that he was hardly of this world. The actual merit of his music hardly entered into this feeling of superiority that was everywhere assumed by the musician and encouraged by those who were his admirers. If he had had ten lessons on the violin that was fiddle, heavenly, he felt called on to let his hair grow long or to have it cut in some eccentric way, as much like some of the elder type of musicians as possible. Just why the hair was to indicate one's ability I have never found out. Sometimes the musician affected queer clothes and still queerer neckties. He was a man of inspiration and had to show his unusualness. No musician could possibly be expected to do ordinary labor. Violent exercise might injure his bow arm or his delicate fingers. Hence the musician was literally "all dressed up and nowhere to go." Some of the most third-rate musicians I have ever known were the most respectful in their dress, appearance, hair and manners, but not in their morals.

Fortunately, the rest of us have by degrees lost our open mouthed awe of musicians, not because we have come to think less of them but because we have learned that a musician has talent, we know now that he must work like anybody else who achieves success. And our knowledge of the work has increased our respect for music as a trade, an occupation, rather than an inspired, unearthly sort of thing. We have seen people with reasonable musical gifts work faithfully that they have done well, as well as this field is most of us can do in ours. Occasionally, but seen people are rare, a genius arises who can do something original and startling in music, but genuine anywhere in it is found every day. Rarely are geniuses very good music is produced. Most of us had to learn our music from people who knew how to play as well as we did.

The change to a more sensible attitude toward music came about when jazz, a Negro product, developed instruments gradually began to look like human beings rather than freaks. Paul Whiteman graduated from a circus. A very good test of the change in attitude is to appear in this little incident. All of us had assembled at our college chapel to hear a new appointment for a position in the music department. Several years ago we had seen the new man and, therefore, had no especial reason to expect anyone except the old-fashioned musician with the freak ish clothes and the wild hair. Imagine our surprise and strange joy when a modestly-dressed young man, looking like a county farm agent or a bond salesman appeared and played the piano, explaining as he played the nature of what he was doing, relating his program to several whole periods of musical history. Still stranger was the feeling of several of us when I told him that he looked more like a county farm agent; he saw the intended compliment and thanked me, whereas a musician a few years before that time would have thought himself grossly insulted if he had been taken for anything but a musician and a very great one at that. Thus passes the eccentric player of tunes, or at least most of the tradition, and I am not weeping to see this old custom disappear.
