3,000 Cars Found Defective In State

Three thousand of the nine-hundred automobiles and trucks checked thus far in the current campaign for safety by members of the Kentucky Highway Patrol have been found defective, according to a report filed with J. Stephen Watkins, Commissioner of the Department of Highways, by Colonel John Baker, director of the police organization. The report covers four weeks of the six weeks campaign period being sponsored by the International Association of Chiefs of Police.

"In making this check, drivers found to have defective brakes, horns, windshield wipers, headlights, tires, rear lights or any other defective equipment defect are directed to have prompt repairs made", Mr. Watkins said. "Arrests are not made; this is a campaign to prevent the rapid increase in traffic accidents. It is our firm conviction that adjustments made promptly on defective equipment will pay dividends in fewer accidents."

In the report of the cars checked, 600 had defective brakes; 530 had no horns; 341 had no windshield wiper; 531 had no headlights or a defective beam; 1,000 had defective tail lights; 694 had no rear light; 439 had defective steering; obstructed glass, rear view window and mirrors.

The drivers contacted are checked and given a "self-examining" folder with 110 questions to be answered by the driver for his own information. If he checks all 10 of these, the query is: "Are you really that good?" If 8 of the 10 are checked, he is told, "Good driving. We need more of you."
