THE GARDEN

By John S. Gardner, College of Agriculture

Early Potatoes II

Because potatoes consist so largely of water, they require soil that has been fitted to hold moisture. Such ability comes from plowed-in human matter, as from a cover crop or sod. Stable manure human may cause scabby potatoes.

To provide a suitable moisture reservoir the land should be plowed at least 10 inches deep. If at first the topsoil does not allow that depth, each year an inch of subsoil may be plowed up until finally 10 inches is reached. The seed bed is completed by disking fine and deep.

The furrows are then laid off 36 inches apart and 5 inches deep and the fertilizer (5-10-5, 4-12-6 or, if need be, 3-9-6 is sown, 1 pound to 20 feet of furrow. After this has been mixed in the soil with a narrow bull-tongue or a hoe handle, the seed is dropped, 13 to 15 inches apart.

The seed pieces should be cut thick and blocky, weighing 1¼ to 1½ ounces, containing one good eye, though more do not matter. Certified seed should always be used, treated against scab and black scurf with Semesan Bel.

The manner of covering the seed depends on the time of planting. If during March, the furrows should be filled level full, but as the season advances and the danger of seed freezing declines, more and more soil may be left off, until, if planting has been deferred to late April, only a hoeful of early need be patted on the seed piece. The progressively shallower seed covering in some degree offsets enforced late planting, as the crop's progress begins only when the leaves reach the light.

When the shoots have reached above the garden's level, filling the furrows is completed. By deep planting, the roots are put in moister, cooler soil, an advantage to a "cool" crop, as potatoes are. Also, level cultivating may be done, further to conserve moisture. No back-breaking, moisture-wasting ridges need be made, but only small amounts of soil drawn to the row to close any cracks the swelling tubers may make.
