The art of going to sleep quickly, and enjoying a full night of sound and wholesome rest, is one of our most valuable achievements. We should train ourselves to select our sleep as definitely as we select our food. Sloppy sleep is like sloppy food. Some people can get along on less sleep than others, just as they can get along on less food. The efficient handling of our bodies is determined by our ability to sleep well.

The other day a gentleman said to me: "I have not had a good night of sleep for six months. This situation is not necessary. For we can work out for ourselves a plan for sleeping.

A light supper, light reading, wholesome conversation, a friendly spirit, and the assurance in our hearts that we have done an honest days work will add to our ability to relax and stretch ourselves on the couch in the fairy land of our dreams. We should never train ourselves to depend upon hot drinks, cold drinks, or strong drinks before retiring. Sleep is a very normal aspect of our lives, and should take its course in the normal way without any stimulants.

Everything that causes vigorous action should be forgotten at bedtime. We should leave behind us all our worries of the day. The nightmare pass about our beds more often when we retire under tension. We should surrender to the sand-man unconditionally, and find ourselves again, after about seven or eight hours of undisturbed repose.

If you are having trouble going into slumberland select something beautiful and think on that. A quiet dale, where the spring flora is in full bloom. Get into one flower to another, pick them, name them, and lie down under some very favorite condition and soon you will find the night is too short. Another good way is to imagine you are down by the crystal-clear river where the forest marches down to the water and an occasional tree bows its head reverently in the quiet rippling stream. The banks of the river are fringed with a pattern of ferns, rhododendrons, lilies, and alders. Cast your line into the stream where fishes play leisurely, and ere you are aware, you have caught what you want, and—sleep.

He sleeps well, who works hard. To earn his daily bread.
And conscience lets him rest.
Wherever he lays his head.

It makes a Difference when you use Mercury Ads.

Tidbits Of Kentucky Folklore

By Dr. Gordon Wilson

Poets through the ages have been accused of fleeing from the world to some place of refuge like an ivory tower, where they refuse to see the blackness and crime of a very real world. Older people often find themselves turning back to an imaginary time when things were better than they are now, when the cars were a little closer to the earth, when trees were deeper snow in winter and more cooling in summer, or, in Riley's phrase, when "the kind we used to be" so happy and so pure. There are some of my friends who probably think that I too have digged a little too much. Fidelity and what I stood for nearly a half century ago. And yet with the years that have followed the war, it is formidable that some of us have an ivory tower to flee to. Even though we may be accused of failing to recognize ugly facts and of ugliest rumors.

All my working life I have been telling my students how very badly everyone needs a sense of humor with the abiding whether we relieve great or small, literature, nature, and people of reason affection. Now I need to say it over and over again to the people who are under my care. The world is wild with fear and rumor, with the spirit of unrest that war always leaves in its wake. It is easier to reach with the gang and forget how some things do not change overnight. But how satisfactory it is to tie one-self to some stout bit of the wreckage of our time and ride out the storm. A little plot of land, an interest in flowers, a love for plain people, a memory of genuine people and times—how valuable these can become in times like these!

Fidelity grows a little more valuable as clouds deepen. Its importance to me in memory is much more than any other value it ever had for me. We felt ourselves left out of the big world when we lived at our little village, but, rather strangely, when we left for social places in the unknown world beyond our hills, we found that the simple philosophy learned behind the plow worked in more complex situations. And this is no addled dream of a middle-aged man. Look around you and see how many of the people whom you trust most fully had experiences in effective but limiting times. Those who tilled the poor fields around Fidelity and that is why we love to turn back to the treasured moments when we were learning to live.

I hope that I will never become senile and actually forget that we were not always happy at Fidelity. There were tragedies that wrung our hearts; we felt ourselves often the victim of forces that we could not control; we, like Hamlet, suffered from "the slings and arrows of outrageous fortune" of office, and the pure brothers of the meagerly-educated but patient merit of the unsung teacher who taught us brief existence. Sometimes we had heads from great literature to the difficulty in reconciling our faith with little schools. We were young and our works. But after all the ignorant of most of the things heartbreaks had been forgotten, that people give good money for, we realized that we had been in just somehow through these experiences the presence of some great idea. Times we got a few glimpses of even though they were fleeting truth, which does not belong might be the mail carrier who in great cities alone or among the came to our village three times a week or powerful but sometimes week, or the greasy tech-ook that as Chaucer loves to say, is found had descended to us from older in a little ox's stall."
