INDIAN SUMMER (D. L. Hershman)

The sun is slowly sinking in the west,
A ball of fire set in a cloudless sky;
The pumpkins try to hide beneath the leaves
That from Jack Frost's kiss soon will die.

The trees discard the long-worn dress of green,
For one that rivals all the rainbow's hue;
And then appear entirely bare and bold,
To while away the time all winter through.

The bundled corn, like soldiers on parade,
Spreads o'er the valley and the distant hills,
And hickory nuts are falling one by one,
While Mr. Squirrel his little storehouse fills.

And down the lane, while evening shadows creep,
Tired sheep and cattle slowly wend their way.
'Tis autumn-time, with Nature at her best,
The closing of an Indian summer day.
