The "Poor Bloody Infantry"

In the light of current events, it is interesting to look back about a year to the time when the headlines were largely occupied with the debate over the kind of weapons we needed, and how the next war would have to be fought. The role of the Air Force was in its ascendancy and in more extreme terms was being argued. It was generally held that the airplane—and most especially jet fighters and the huge intercontinental bombers—could practically all the work. The Navy, the argument ran, would in the future be only a minor, auxiliary service, and should be kept down to most possibly all of its own planes and carriers. The tank was obsolete, or nearly so, because new weapons had made it practically as vulnerable to a jet as a jeep. And in the case of the tank, always payment in just arms, it would be a relatively minor one next time.

It was this argument U. S. News & World Report, in an article on military plans and strategy, to say: "We in Korea in putting U. S. military aid, new weapons, and new plans to the test of experience. On the basis of the report of the test, the report card on performance can be marked. Frankly, it is not good. The Koreans in Korea has certainly proven that, in this particular kind of 'small' war at least, the new weapons and new ideas have not worked the expected wonders.

In this war, the biggest 'bumbers' have not been used, nor are they likely to be used to any extent. They are adapted to globe, all-weather, in which they would carry. Asbestos to seal engines, targets thousands of miles away from being hit.

The Air Force has performed splendidly in Korea, and has inflicted heavy damage on the enemy. But reports from the front have said time and again that the jet planes, in this type of campaign, have been a disappointment. Valuable as they are in combat, they are too fast, and too limited in the time they can stay aloft, to operate as well as the support of troops as they have been.

Navy air, once written off as an obsolete weapon, has proven enormously vital. The carrier fleet, which has been the backbone of the fleet, has been the backbone of the fleet.

The President's speech was a landmark in the history of the United States. It was a landmark in the history of the United States.
