Primitive Thinking

By Dr. Gordon Wilson

To primitive thinkers there is no middle ground in any controversy. Black is black, white is white, up is up, down is down. Gray as a color does not exist. A thing is all white or all black. No choice is available in language or custom; one course is wholly right, the other wholly wrong.

In our recent war times we soon found ourselves drifting right back into primitive thinking. All that our opponents did was wholly wrong. All Germans and Japanese deserved to be killed, regardless of their age or sex or helpless condition. No American was allowed the privilege of opposing war that would make him a friend to our enemies. Of course, there is some truth in this primitive stand. When a person is facing death or injury, it is a little too late to discuss fine point of morals or law. But it took only a few days of peace to make most of us wonder whether we were always right, the other fellow always wrong, or whether there was not a great mistake on both sides. A typical illustration is the status of German war brides. Do you know of anybody so crude as to deny respect to some German girl who has married one of our boys and come to cast her lot with ours? Does our country continue to exist forward individuals? Thinking back a generation, do you still condemn all people north of the Ohio River because their ancestors were Yankees? How about the hall of our own Kentucky that was Unionist in sympathy? Were those people not Kentuckians because they failed to agree with yours and mine, who fought on the other side.

Every day as a teacher I have to face this problem of 100% this or 100% that. Daily some student says that Miss Mary or some other revered teacher said that, thus-and-so is never right, that another expression is never wrong. With all the assurance of an atheist Hebrew when he clinched his statement by a "Thus saith the Lord," students feel that there can be only one way, right, therefore all other ways must be wrong. One of my teachers a long time ago felt exactly this way: it was illogical in his way of looking at things for there to be more than two ways. And his way, strangely, was always the right one. If you learned that way you passed. If you learned any other, you failed. And that was that. The stern old fellow had not the remotest suggestion of a sense of humor, else he would have got out behind the barn and laughed at himself until he was 250-lbs-fat. Unfortunately, there are a great many people of his kind and due to not like him, dead and buried years after eighty-odd years of being absolutely right.

It is this positive ground of the number "that I bitterly resent in the literary treatment of Kentucky and Kentuckians. We are either a barefooted mountaineers with seven or fifteen children and a still up the hollow, or we are Lilliputian rich owners of licensed distilleries or owners of race horses. A recent article in a nationally read magazine illustrates this very attitude. Kentucky, or a single county in the mountains, is picked out for just about all the superstitious ness possible because people read large families. Thousands of people will read that article and smile ingratiatingly, knowing without further ado that all of Kentucky is mountainous and overrun with large families. If only outsiders would do this sort of ridiculous primitive thinking. I would not have on my fighting clothes all the time. But insiders who like to appeal to the big boys outside are often just as guilty of primitive thinking as the strangers within our gates. Overpopulation is a serious thing, we all admit. I continued to Leslie County, Kentucky? Is that county forever cursed because some outsider wanted to write an article that would attract jaded readers? I am afraid that our war nerves are still working over time, whether we are reading lists of casualties or merely trying to find some monster lurking in the bushes ready to devour us. Why not an article on "Who's RIGHT with Kentucky or the world?"

HELLO THERE!

I have returned from the Midwest Beauty Trade Show in Chicago and enjoyed myself to the hilt and learned how to make you more beautiful. Thousands of up-to-date, fashion wise hairdressers, beauty shop owners, and operators from all parts of the United States attended this great beauty show to learn more about their business. And that's why I went!

There were some wonderful exhibits there by manufacturers of all the products we use in our beauty salon. Everything has the new 1950 look—and I was casting my eye over all the new inventions and improvements for shop service.

I also attended just as many of the lectures and demonstrations as possible and, while I learned many new methods of permanent waving, hairstyling, and many other things. Last, but certainly not least, I have inside information on wonderful new spring hairstyles, from hairstylists who are famous in the world of fashion.

I am back in the shop now, eager to tell you about my trip to the Windy City, and what I've learned there. I'm all set for Spring—so give you your next permanent, to remedy those dry and, beween the two of us, you're in for a beautifying experience. Come in to see me soon.

Cordially,
Edythe M. Rich
