The Table d'Hote

How often have you walked into a restaurant... in Kentucky—looked at the menu, and read "Veal and Ham, Maryland style," "Ibido prosciutto," "Lemon duckling," or "Tennessee mutton"?

We Kentuckians have long regarded ourselves on our wonderful home cooked, our old-fashioned recipes, and our traditionally fine dishes. Still, our restaurants persist in specializing in one or more of these products.

It makes quite a difference to the waiter of Kentucky's farmers. October 15 and 21 is observed this year as National and restaurant owners in the Commonwealth daily purchase products, meats, and canned goods which are grown and produced in neighboring states.

When you buy Kentucky's produce you keep your money in the State. It's still within the boundaries of the Commonwealth, still to serve you again.

To assist in the culinary satisfaction of our farmers, and to preserve our good name among connoisseurs of fine foods, the Agriculture Committee of the Kentucky Chamber of Commerce is taking steps to put Kentucky back on the menu.

At its meeting October 10 in Louisville, the Chamber's committee, chaired by J. Ed Parker, Jr., Lexington, adopted a program designed to promote Kentucky's farm products.

Competition between their forces connoisseurs in gasoline quality on each other's territory to the jump on his business rivals. So it goes, in every phase of the enterprise.

During the week, local oil men over the country will distribute the contribution their industry has made to national defense and to the comfort and well-being of 150,000,000 Americans. It is a solid, worth boasting.
