The Harvest

It is autumn. The days have over the world with increasing softness, born out of the coolness of the night and a bright moon.
With the morning, a million sunbeams from the crystals of the sun, like an elfin ballet, descended in jeweled fire.
The sun, the advancing day pushes down the curtains on the harvest and a grasshopper there has begun its melancholy song, perhaps chanting the same lament of an ancient grasshopper who played all summer.
Droning loquax their serenade with rising and falling notes, amid the thinnest leaves of elm and oak.
