Today's Farmer Is A Business Man
By WILLIAM H. DEAREN
Chief Farm Service Advisor

The business man need not be a farmer, but the modern farmer has to be a practical, thoughtful businessman to make a success of farming. Farming must be planned and programmed as a business, with good farm management directing farm operations.

There are four basic resources that make up any business enterprise, and farming is no exception. These are land, labor, capital and management.

The way you use the first three is management.

The best earnings are almost invariably made by farmers who master all of the major management problems, and who have the best business management programs.

1. A sound land-use and soil conservation program, including rotation, soil building and erosion control programs.
2. High crop yields through soil improvement programs, careful seed selection, seed bed preparation, cultivation and harvesting.
3. Livestock best suited to the particular farm, family, and market, healthy animals of good quality, properly fed and handled.
4. A careful plan for the use of available labor.

It is a plan for the purchase and use of machinery and equipment. On small farms there will be a plan for the cooperative ownership and use of heavy, seasonal equipment.

Plans for the construction and repair of buildings and fences, and the remodeling of outworn buildings for new uses.

Handling programs that will produce market quality products at the season, these produce the best prices.

A program for developing the farm into a business sufficient, large to provide a satisfactory living for the family.

5. A program for the sound use of credit.

The Co-operative.

A farm operated on these principles will be a productive, profitable operation.

FACTORY

One Hour's Grinding - One Week's Feed; Operating Cost About $1.00 A Month

In one hour, Richard Rout, Woolford county farmer, can grind enough one-year-old grain to feed his seven cows for an entire week. It is no wonder then that he considers his electric hammer mill one of the most important pieces of electrical equipment on his 60-acre farm.

Rout prefers to operate his hammer mill with a three-phase motor rather than with a two-phase converter, saves him valuable time and operates for less. He estimates his operating cost at less than a dollar a month.

Depending on the grain and feed he wants to grind, his hammer mill will turn out from 200 to 1100 pounds of feed an hour. The amount of moisture and the forward amount largely determine the output of the mill.

Rout believes, too, that he has solved the milk-holding problem some farmers have when grinding cereals. He feeds the mill slowly and gives the corn sufficient time to grind. He is never troubled with choking.

Many farmers, too, are finding that overhead storage bins are profitable. Overhead bins permit gravity feeding to the milking parlors for one man to handle the entire operation. If the ground feed is returned to overhead bins, additional time and labor are saved in moving the feed to where it's eaten.

And even when the mill is operating the farmer can be free to do other work if he connects an automatic control in the power line. The control is simple to install and requires little attention.

Hammer mills, complete with motor and other accessories operate out from about $400 up. Rout believes his mill is one investment he'll never regret.

If you can't find the fastest processing materials you need—and estimates are developed by the manufacturer. You can save all the same dust that comes from just and the like. To use for storing from your own grain. Use for storing from your own grain. Use for storing from your own grain. Use for storing from your own grain.

These continuing increases in rates are why more and more taxpayers are demanding that their compression put a stop to non-essential spending.
