THIS PETTY PACE

BY BROWN LEE YATES

THE BATTLE LINE is congested with heavy ordnance — socks, briefs, shorts, and unmentionables. The line is short, but it is the scene of more military ritual than most battlefields. You might call this narrow front of strategy just a clothesline, hotly contested by my wife and the lady in the upstairs apartment, but the battle fence field marshals call it No Man's Land.

One washday, the enemy arrived "fanned with the mostest," forcing my wife to retreat with our wet wash. When my wife retaliated with like onslaught the next Monday, Each Monday, one of the generals manned battle stations a little earlier. Soon my commander had me on dawn patrol (or nightshirt reconnaissance) looking for the enemy's approach.

When either woman pinned an item on the line first, she won the fray. They'd make a dash with heavy wash baskets, and one would withdraw when the other had clipped a wet sock on the line. Why all the maneuvering with heavy artillery, I asked, when a light foray would do? I pinned a hanky on the line Sunday night and it repelled the enemy's dawn attack.

But the enemy's hubby is a better diplomat. He replaced my precedent-like Sunday night hanky with a precedence system (washtub protocol) in which diapers preceded hankies because "baby is crying for dry pants"; shorts preceded diapers for no practical reason; ammunition aides preceded shorts. Continually, our wash was tossed on the line and as we were outflanked by pink panties with precedence.

The enemy's hubby and I observe diplomatic amenities. We converse amiably, never mentioning war underwear, "though it's continually in our closets.

Now he's evolved a precedence in color in which flagrant hues supercede mild ones, because, he says, the bright tints fade more while shirt of the line last week and victoriously flew his yellow one in its place. But my wife, I'm ashamed to admit, held the line this week by unfurling my orange shorts. Next week, the criterion will be size in place of color (large garments shrink if not dried immediately, he says), and my medium underwear will become absolute-militiarity.

Poor Farm Lighting Termed Dangerous

If the average farmer will look around him and pick out the one thing that most needs modernization on his farm, he's pretty apt to find it's the lighting.

Even on farms where electricity is widely and soundly used, lighting in the home, in the farm buildings, and in the yard will very likely be inadequate. And since the lighting system is usually the foundation of the entire wiring system, few farmers can make efficient use of electricity without a good lighting plan.

Poor lighting on the farm is dangerous lighting. Accidents on farms are frequent and expensive, especially those that could be eliminated by proper lighting. A single accident due to poor light can cost more than the proper lighting job that would have prevented it.

Planned Program Is Necessary

A good many farmers shy away from a planned, adequate lighting program because of the fancied expense. But if the program is planned first, it can be carried out a bit at a time as the money becomes available. Then, when the program is completed, the farm will be adequately wired, and adequately lighted, a far cry from what most of them are today.

The wiring program is the basic program, the proper location of poles, of meters, of a large enough entrance, of adequate circuits. Once this is done, the rest will fall in place.

KU farmers can call on their division farm service adviser (just phone your nearest KU office and tell them what you want) for help in planning proper wiring and lighting for the entire farmstead. This service is free.

An adequate lighting system will soon pay for itself in the way it speeds up chores, prevents accidents, and makes it possible to handle those emergency jobs that invariably turn up after dark.

DOES A LOT—COSTS LITTLE

When you examine your monthly electric bill in the light of all the work the bill represents—of all the jobs electricity does daily on your farm and in your home—you can appreciate what a genuine bargain electricity really is.

FACT FACTORY

KU has made a valiant effort to keep rural service as dependable and trouble free as city service. It isn't easy. The problem of voltage drops on far flung rural lines has been met by increasing the number of points from which electricity is fed into distribution lines. The 35 Rural Group KU town servers at which power are fed from 54 strategically placed substations. Increasing the capacity of transmission and distribution lines is always a never-ending task.

KU's overall job is a big one, even for an organization so experienced and widespread. Not only is the use of electricity on the farm growing. Increased industrialization in towns is demanding more and more power. Farms using 1,500 kilowatts a year today are expected to use 4,000 or 5,000 annually in another decade.

But no matter how high this usage grows, KU will plan its expansion to meet the full demands of all its rural, residential, and commercial customers, and the rural co-operatives it serves.

Since World War II, KU has built two large power generating plants—Tyrone and Green River—and has recently doubled the Pineville plant capacity. Further expansion is already under way.

Alfalfa Losses Go When Drier Installed

Losses that sometimes took half the alfalfa crop have been eliminated since a new hay drier was installed, says Clay Truitt of the C. V. Whitney farm near Lexington.

The Farmer-Moore drier used by Truitt is a portable unit, using a five-horsepower motor and an oil burning heater to speed up drying in damp weather. Most farmers, however, find it more practical and economical to mow dry hay with unheated air. Except in very moist weather the results are comparable.

On a recent test curing of 212 bales of clover hay, the KU Farm Service Department found that it took 57 hours running time, and 218 kilowatt hours of electricity, to dry the 212 bales. Fuel oil consumed cost $34.20. Actually the mow and drier could have handled up to 400 bales for small additional cost.

Drying Costs 75c To $1.20 A Ton

The cost of electricity for drying a ton of baled hay with this drier will range from 75 cents to $1.50, depending on quantity, moisture content, and humidity. Fuel oil costs average around $5.00 a ton.

The same equipment can also be used to dry corn, and other grain.

Hay driers are being used more and more by Kentucky farmers, some of whom have found it economical and practical to use them in open-sided hay sheds out in the field.

Truitt, in commenting on the electrical cost of mow curing, said, "Our hay drier certainly pays its way both through the saved and the quality of the hay we get from it."
