Crops Suffer Less On Fertile Land

Farmers who attended the field day meetings at the Western Kentucky Experiment Station at Princeton early in August were impressed at the corn, soybean and other crops on fertile land. Where maximum phosphorus and potash had been used and the soil further enriched by growing legumes, the crops were more abundant and more sure. Yields on other land were lower.

Despite drought that destroyed corn crops in all but the best spots, early yields of both corn and soybeans were "fair to good" if early rains come, it was noted.
