Tid Bits Of Kentucky Folklore

One of the readers of the column recently asked me why I had not written about plumes. Frankly, that and many other omissions on my part have been unpardonable, for I surely have known for many years that plumes have ceased to be the important things that used to be.

Ladies who were real ladies used to value plumes more than probably any other article of dress or adornment. Plumes meant that the owner had taste and a reasonable amount of ready money. Plumes set off one's natural beauty and at the same time showed an interstate origins. In fact, plumes lasted through generations, one inherited plumes the same as one inherited fine old dressers and beds. Once I taught four sisters back in the days when no lady that was a lady would have been caught dead without a hat on, who regularly came to my class wearing identical hats on each of which a large plume waved. It almost looked like a family uniform. Anyone with reasonable intelligence would know forthwith that those ladies had invested some of their earnings as country school teachers in property that did not soon lose its value. Other girls who came and went may not have worn plumes on the hats, but these young ladies, like the little colored girl who told me, "Ise got shoes, and I wahs 'im, too," were their plumes proudly.

Sometimes the plumes seemed a bit too much on the many. I have seen hats that must have robbed a whole ostrich. To sit behind one such hat at church gave me a sickening sensation, for the preacher appeared only intermittently between the waving plumes. One could almost imagine himself in heaven, where plumes were supposed to be plentiful, only I hope the plumes there do not shut off the show as these earthly ones sometimes did.

But plumes often stayed around, disconnected with hats as such, and in this guise seemed to represent something valuable that might sometimes be useful. It was my aim to recolor plumes and make them look like new. In many of the old bandboxes that ladies used to own there might be stored these family treasures, waiting some new use, when the wearer would fairly bowl over somebody at church or at a Fourth of July picnic.

To-me as a small child it was just a step either way from a plume to a dead bird or the major portion of it on a hat. I have seen birds that almost suggested the headgear of the Grand Wizzer in the cartoon Alley Oop. Even if the whole bird was not used, there were wings or make-believe wings that certainly had come from some unfortunate. Birds on hats seemed to be the last word in style, just about everything had been at some time. Not to have a bird on your hat was to be brand you as lazy or poor or worse. Even if these words was cutting, especially to ladies. Above everything else real ladies wanted to appear as born ladies, not one new enterlopers whose ancestors were plain trash, as common as pig tracks. If fashion had decreed a whole barnyard for a hat, I can see certain ladies of my acquaintance wearing a new creation, the envy of all the others. Else Caroline Parsquet disapproved as a bird because of the fad of wearing the whole bird on its wings. The American Egret almost followed the Dodo out. If the United States and Canada had not acted in time some forty years ago, I probably would have gone to my grave a very old man without ever having seen an egret. Now I see them quite often, even with their regal breast and tail feathers, and so far as I know, only an occasional vandal in my part of the world is so little struck with the beauty and beauty of the bird that he uses his trigger finger but does, instead, to see the majestic flight of this romantic bird. Let us hope that if feathers are desired they can be those of the ostrich, which would only mean one or the turkey or some similar bird rather than the wild bird that has no other reason for being slaughtered except that his plumage might adorn a fair lady.

Once Eroded Farm Now Good Producer

How a badly eroded 50 acres had been made into a productive farm in six years was explained by Mr. and Mrs. Everett Nash when 372 farmers and farm women recently gathered at their place in Grayson county. The Nashes are enrolled in the Farm and Home Development Program of the University of Kentucky.

The farm was bought for $3,100 in 1946. Limestone was applied at the rate of 4½ tons an acre, plus a ton of phosphate and a 200 pounds of potash. No corn or tobacco is grown. Forty-eight acres are in fescue, orchard grass, lespereza and red clover.

A Grade-A dairy of 14 cows produced 60,000 pounds of milk the past year, worth $3,587, and 40,000 broilers added $6,400. Two broiler houses 40 by 100 feet cost $7,000 and remodeling the dairy barn and installing grade-A equipment cost $1,200. Two wells and two ponds furnish water to the house, dairy barn and poultry houses.

Plans of the Nashes include production of the land and use of artificial breeding to build a herd averaging 8,000 pounds of milk a cow.

While the small house on the farm was remodeled and made modern, plans call for a new house within the next two years.
