Both here and abroad, it is commonly said that mass production is an American economical miracle.

No one can dispute that—as the incredible wealth of goods and services enjoyed by our people attests. But an often-overlooked fact is that mass production, for all its wonders, would be of small value without some comparably great and efficient system for getting the output of our farms and factories into the hands of far-flung consumers.

That is where mass distribution comes in. It was pioneered by the chain store systems in their early days, their underlying and then-revolutionary idea being that it was sound policy to charge but a small profit on each sale and to make an adequate total profit through heavy volume. Since then other kinds of stores of every type have successfully applied this idea to their operations. Its salient characteristic—which we see in concrete form on every Main Street—is free and open competition, with all stores seeking to attract business through lower prices, wider stocks, better service, more compelling advertising, and other inducements.

Mass distribution is the full partner of mass production in building and maintaining our splendid living standards.

Need A Doctor?

The American Medical Association, 535 North Dearborn St., Chicago, Illinois, has issued a highly informative pamphlet describing how the small communities of the nation can get about obtaining resident physicians.

To begin with, two questions must be answered. First, does the community really need a physician and will it support him; second, will the entire community cooperate to demonstrate its need and desire for a physician? As the booklet points out, in these days of rapid transportation it is not necessary that a doctor be located in every hamlet. He should establish himself where he can do the most good for the greatest number of people.

The community in search of a doctor should inventory what it can offer him, in the light of medical practice, family living, and economic considerations. Such factors as adequate housing and good schools, for instance, are important inducements. It is a good idea to prepare a brochure listing the community's points of interest, advantages, and other pertinent information. This brochure is then sent to deans of medical schools and to hospitals in the region.

Some communities have successfully solved the problem by raising funds to build and equip small but up-to-date clinics and hospitals, which are a strong attraction to ambitious young doctors. Others have made arrangements for low rental on home and office during the financially difficult first year of practice, after which the physician has the option of paying full rental or buying.

The point is that a community which really needs and can support a doctor, and which will go about the job in the proper manner, can get one. The AMA's pamphlet points the way.

Big Order

Herbert Hoover is head of the bipartisan commission appointed by President Eisenhower to study reorganization of the executive branch of the government.

Asked what he would seek to accomplish, the former President said he hoped that the commission would "contribute something to lessen what President Eisenhower has aptly described as our 'staggering economic burdens,' strengthen private enterprise, reduce the burden of taxation, lessen bureaucratic tyranny over our citizens and generally improve the efficiency of our government."

That is an enormous order. But it is an order that must be filled if we are to be saved from financial ruin as a nation, and from the destruction of freedom which is the tragic and inevitable result of ever-expanding, ever-more-costly government.

Audience Participation Lacking: "Let Me Say 'Amen' To That"

By Dr. Gordon Wilson

So many things that I used to know are passing that I often think that I should be introduced to some of the grandchildren with whom I am to speak. I am introduced, of course, in a set sort of way, with plenty of complimentary things said that I would have a hard time living up to. What I mean is that I should be told how far along in the course of evolution my audience has arrived, how sophisticated it is, how far removed from the soil or crowd I used to know at Fiddlety or Podunk or even larger places.

Not many years ago I was making a comeback circuit address at a good-sized and highly cultured county-seat town. In my usual animated way I said something pretty strongly. An elderly retired preacher said, "Amen," quite as strongly as I had made my point. The graduating class, sitting behind me, got tickled at the old gentleman's antiquated manner and giggled from then on until my speech was over. And set I did not feel the least bit perturbed at the old man's approval of what I was saying. That is exactly what any self-respecting person would have said at Sulphur Springs near Fidelity when the century and I were considerably younger. Not to have spoken up in such a way would have left the poor preacher feeling that he had not said anything appealing or spiritual.

Once I knew a preacher who preached for an hour or so with no audience response other than solid sitting and gazing at the preacher. He said something that seemed to him worthy of being recognized, not a sound was heard. "Why doesn't somebody say 'Amen' to that?" he asked almost impersonally. An elderly retired minister said, very deliberately, "Well, I will say 'Amen' to that, my brother." Even at Sulphur Springs there were some people, including me, who almost broke into a laugh. And I still don't worry for the poor preacher, who had labored hard for a feeling that he was getting his doctrine across and had left so cold because nobody had said "Amen."

Many of you who read this article can recall when it was not at all uncommon for such responses from the audience to be made, though we white people did not make as complete a show of it as our colored friends. A hone responses are almost as much a part of worship as prayer or song or reading the Scripture or preaching.

One Negro preacher that I have heard of used to say to his congregation: "You'll have to help me, my brothers and sisters, or I can't preach this sermon." That help meant, in every case, know the appropriate responses to show that all were in the proper mood and that the preacher was really telling them. You will think me grossly old-fashioned if I admit, when I say that I like this audience participation. We public speakers often say our pieces and go away from the platform wondering whether we ever got across what we were trying to explain; we feel as we're tickers often feel when we grade an examination paper and wonder where the students were the day that we made so plain some worths fact or doctrine or rule.

Of course, I do not know what form I would prescribe for this response from the audience. Some highly cultured audiences would probably be offended when some unrestrained old brother joined in while I was speaking; others might laugh so much at him that they would fail to get what I was trying to say; still others would wonder if what the speaker would think of the neighborhood if such an antiquated thing developed.

Not long ago I talked to one of the most learned groups in the state of Kentucky. Several times in my hour-long talk I had occasion to speak directly to some member of the audience; he and I might carry on a brief conversation while I was getting myself lined up for the next round of talk. I hope the audience did not mind. I know the elderly scholar and I were having the times of our lives, being just as unrestrained as we would have been at a dinner table. It is in that intimacy in the old-fashioned "amen" that makes me recall it with joy. I hope that this sacred old word will not utterly lose its significance and its appropriateness for the modern world. And I hope some old-timer will say, "Let me say 'Amen' to that."

Bookmobile Pledged In Jackson County

"There isn't even a public library for anyone who likes to read in his spare time."

Thus did young Elmer Gray of McKee, Jackson county, write sadly in a 1952 essay that won him a $300 college scholarship in a Kentucky Chamber of Commerce economic-development contest.

But Jackson county appears today to be on the road toward filling the lack he mentioned.

Funds for the operation of a bookmobile—a traveling library—in the county have been pledged, according to James R. Baker, superintendent of the county schools.

Jackson is among the growing list of counties where pledges have pledged to obtain funds for the operation of a Bookmobile. It is hoped to have 100 of the traveling libraries operating in the state's rural areas by next year.

The Jackson county pledge came in one phase of the two-point Bookmobile drive.

Business firms, labor groups and other organizations will be asked during a Bookmobile finance campaign September 8 to 30 to pledge funds for the purchase of a Bookmobile. Each traveling library, fully stocked with books, costs $3,000.

The Bookmobile will be assigned to communities where sponsors pledge the necessary funds to operate the traveling libraries for a year—also approximately $3,000. This includes such things as the salary of a driver-librarian, fuel, garage facilities, etc. Such sponsors can be county or local authorities, community organizations, or individuals.

It is this pledge—to finance the operation of a Bookmobile—that has been given to Jackson county.

More Than 3,900 Attend Boys Camps

More than 3,900 Kentucky boys, members of Junior Conservation Clubs, spent week-long camping trips at two camps maintained by the State Department of Fish and Wildlife Resources this summer.

A report by the department shows that 3,082 boys visited Camp Earl Wallace on Lake Cumberland in a camping season starting May 23 and running through Aug. 15, and 1, 398 boys attended Camp Curry on Kentucky Lake between May 23 and Aug. 22.

At the camps the boys were instructed in swimming, fishing, boat operations, marksmanship, safety and nature subjects.

There are some 35,000 members in 520 Juniors clubs throughout the Commonwealth. The clubs are sponsored by senior sportsmen's clubs and service organizations in communities with these schools.

There were 3,082 boys at the camps in the summer of 1952.

LARGER CHECKS LEGAL

Larger monthly checks for retired men teachers under the State's teacher retirement system are legal, according to a ruling given by the Attorney General's office.

The ruling held that the payments are made on the basis of mortality tables now in use that show the men have a life expectancy of 13½ years on retirement while the female expectancy is 16½ years. This means that payment must be made at a higher rate to the men in order that they exhaust the contributions they and the State have made to the retirement system and the interest the funds have earned.

The question of the legality of the payment differential was brought up by a Louisville woman.

An Indian effigy carved out of yellow pine found on a cliff near Pineville, in 1869, is believed to be the only thoroughly preserved wooden prehistoric image found in Kentucky. It is now in the Museum of the American Indian Heye Foundation, New York City.

55-Day Waterfowl Hunting Season To Open In Kentucky November 17

A 55-day waterfowl hunting season for Kentucky has been assigned by the Fish and Wildlife Service with the opening day being November 17 and the closing day January 10.

The season is the same length as for last year but with some minor changes in the bag and possession limit and seasons granted for woodcock and jack snipe.

Earl Wallace, Commissioner of the Department of Fish and Wildlife Resources, pointed out that Kentucky could have had a split season of 25 days each but in accepting these it would have sacrificed five days of hunting. It was decided then to accept a continuous season and thereby gain the five extra days of hunting.

Shooting Hours

Shooting hours for this season are to begin one-half hour before sunrise and continue until sunset, Central Standard Time, except on opening day when shooting will start 12 noon. Last season the shooting was stopped one hour before sunset.

Duck season for this year begins on November 17 and continues to January 10. The bag limit is four with a possession limit of eight, which may not include more than one wood duck.

The season on geese is the same as for ducks, with a bag and possession limit of five which may not include more than one Canada Goose.

The dates of the coot season are the same as for last year with bag and possession limit again being ten.

A 40-day season was granted on woodcock, to begin on November 20 and continue through December 29. The bag limit for this species is four per day and a possession limit of eight. A jack snipe season also was assigned, for the first time since 1941, to begin on November 20 and continue through December 4. Bag and possession limit for jack snipe is eight.
