More Power From Coal

Electricity is one of the few things we buy which average cost a less than in previous days. And part of the credit for that achievement must go to another industry.

In 1951, the electric industry became coal's largest customer, and in the year exactly half of the power generated in this country came from coal. More than 87 per cent of the 32,000,000 kilowatts of new electric generating capacity installed from 1947 to the end of 1952 was in steam generating plants, the great bulk of which are fueled with coal. And the figure for the 400,000,000 kilowatts in capacity scheduled for the 1953-56 period is even higher for fuel—84 per cent.

Over the years, the coal industry and electric utility industry have worked together to develop power to make good use further and also to use it as a product of power.

It is striking in 1954, in less than 22 years of coal's rise as a product of power, that the coal industry has produced more than 200 times as much coal as did the same job in 1932. This is reflected in what the price of coal is today.

What of the future? The Atomic Energy Commission is authority for this statement: "Even assuming the most conservative estimates, the amount of electricity expected to triple by 1975."
