COMMENT

August Hour

The first flaming hues of autumn have a delightful way of showing up in the edge of a late summer wood, or on the southern slope of a pasture hill. One likes to think that August sparks the color that will flame in brilliance across the uplands after a summer has stepped serenely into the twilight of its placid and pleasing reign. Summer is already bowing out to make room for the crispness and start of a new vigorous sovereign. August may well be called the dawn of autumn's glowing rule.

For one who remembers how the tender touch of spring can creep into so many winter days, there is nothing disturbing about the manner in which the rich fall signs turn up weeks before a frost can nip the blossoms of the goldenrod and aster. Even if a man has never been able to get enough of summer and her sunlit charm, he likes to have the year send out her signals to mark the approach of crisp and sharper hours.

Autumn will rule with a keener hand than the placid palm of a midsummer hour. Yet, even if one could ignore the flags of warning now unfurling on the August hills, he would hardly close his eyes or seal his heart to the brilliant hues and spires that have already found themselves across the land.

Autumn may start to light its lamps in the heat of a summer sun Summer may be as strong, winter was in closing up her house, and there will be long and pleasing hours of flaming sumac leaves on the thin wild slopes. There will be brilliance in the woodbine spires, climbing the trunk of a maple, or an elm.

One who walks with the year walks in contentment with this August hour He follows the flaming torches through a wood's edge, or up a hill. He follows all the way with a ripening year into the clear crisp morning when an autumn frost will silver the grass blades, and the stones.—Lansing Chrisman
