Satellite to provide

Spectacular Program

The satellite program—most spectacular feature of the International Geophysical Year — will broaden man's knowledge in four important fields, says the National Geographic Society.

Sensitive instruments in the elaborately plated and polished magnesium sphere will record in-ormation on solar radiation, particularly the effects of ultraviolet light from the towering geysers of flame that periodically convulse the sun's surface.

Other instruments will probe our own planet's radiation—both that reflected from the sun and that generated by internal heat.

In addition, scientists expect to learn more about the mysteries of cosmic rays, as well as the nature of the magnetic field surrounding the earth. By-products will include an accurate determination of atmospheric density and a clearer picture of the earth's shape.

Due to its highly reflective surface, the tiny moon—only 20 inches in diameter—is expected to be visible through binoculars under ideal conditions as it hurtles around the earth at 18,000 miles an hour.

Volunteer observers will supplement official checkpoints in tracing the satellite's path across the heavens. From these sightings, an electronic calculator in Washington will instantly provide speed, altitude, and orbit.

Mammoth Cameras

The most accurate chart of the artificial moon's course will be recorded by 12 mammoth, specially designed cameras strategically emplaced throughout the world. Based on such photographic observation, accurate measurements between points on the earth's surface will be determinable within 30 feet. Due to irregularities in the earth's shape, present-day geographic measurements often err by as much as 500 feet over long distances.

The three-stage rocket that will launch the satellite on its historic flight into space is 72 feet long and weighs 11 tons. It will propel the instrument-crammed sphere to an altitude of perhaps 300 miles and impart a speed of 26,470 feet a second at the moment of release.

Rocket enthusiasts note that this is more than 70 per cent of "escape velocity"—the speed necessary to overcome Earth's gravitational pull and make sure space travel possible.

Tomato late blight hitting state crops

Keep a close watch on tomato and potato fields for the disease "late blight," the Kentucky Agricultural Experiment Station pathology department advises.

R. A. Chapman, pathologist, said the disease has been found in Caldwell and Whitley counties in Caldwell county, he said a two-acre field, set with plants from southern sources, has been plowed under because of loss from the disease.

Commercial growers and home gardeners are urged to keep a close watch on their tomato and potato plantings for the first signs of the disease. Samples should be sent to him, Chapman said, for inspection and analysis, at the agronomy department of the Experiment Station, Lexington.

Spray tomatoes and potatoes with either Zineb or Maneb, according to manufacturers' directions, Chapman noted, at weekly intervals during rainy weather, or periods of cool weather with heavy dews.

In dry weather, the interval between sprayings may be lengthened to 10 days to two weeks. These sprays will control other diseases as well as late blight, he said.

Variety of crops for horticulture field day

Commercial vegetable producers and home gardeners alike will get a complete run down on production methods when the annual Horticulture Field Day of the UK Agricultural Experiment Station's horticulture department is held at Lexington, July 16.

Plastic greenhouse work, fruit-setting hormone sprays, vegetable variety trials, chemical weed control of strawberries and several vegetable crops, culture methods of strawberries, seed bed preparation and culture of forest tree seedlings, strawberry breeding tests, blueberry production, raspberry mulching tests, and fruit orchard work—all these will be demonstrated.

The horticulturists set the field day two weeks earlier this year, to let visitors see crops in actual production rather than after their harvest.

The plastic greenhouse work is attracting national attention—includes growing tomatoes and lettuce and vegetable and flower transplants. Greenhouses with permanent-type plastics will be inspected, and improved heating and ventilating methods shown.

Farmers will see the stimulation of growth and yield of several different vegetables including tomatoes, potatoes, sweet corn, beans, and others.

Fruit-setting hormones, announced last year, will be explained. These materials increase the yield and size of tomatoes; in addition the need of fertilizers in relation to hormone-set fruit will be demonstrated.

The session opens at 10 a.m (CDT) and concludes at 3 p.m. Lunch will be available at the plots.

Gigging season

he must have in his possession an Experimental Gigging Census card which may be secured at any of the following points in the county: Williams Restaurant, Carlisle and Mack Ritchie's lake at Jacktown.

The Department is asking the gigger or bow hunter to fill out a card for each individual trip with complete information as to number of fish taken and approximate poundage, and return them to one of the above stations.

This is strictly an experimental project and is being conducted in the South Fork of Licking River and its tributaries only.

All game fish that are inadvertently taken must be returned to the water immediat-ly. Any giggers or bow hunters found with game fish in their possession will be liable for arrest.

This project will be under the direction of fisheries personnel and conservation officers in the respective counties, and they will check creels, gigging time, water conditions and other data required in the experiment.

TID BITS

Human race has hard time learning anything new: "must rush the season"

It seems that we members of the human race have a hard time learning anything new. Right now it is Blackberry Winter,; a cool spell that always comes around every spring and makes us wonder whether we did not rejoice a bit too early that winter was over. It seems plain laziness to wait about planting corn, for instance, when the weather is getting warmer and warmer and oak leaves are as big as mouse's ears. And many a farmer around here has wasted his good hybrid seed corn by refusing to remember that it pays to wait until proper weather to plant crops. Many a field, doubtless, will have to be replanted, and hybrid seed corn is expensive.

I can recall how hard it was for farmers at Fidelity to learn that the seasons down there were not in every way identical with those in North Carolina, where nearly everybody had come from. One year some would-be early bird planted corn, at least some corn, in late February. Just how old it did it cannot remember, but, it was probably planted over a time or two. Whittier says in some of his historical sketches that his ancestors refused to believe in the New England winters and practically unknown. Chilblains were common as a result of not obeying American weather rather than English weather.

Science has been such a wide range of changes in ways of living that it is not surprising that many people have a hard time adapting to new conditions. Weather varies somewhat, but there is a more observable consistency in it than many people like to admit. To say that there were some snowless winters in Grandpa's day or that there were summers then as hot and dry as some of our fairly recent ones would make Grandpa's added memories seem inaccurate, and that would never do. But, with modern methods of plowing and sowing and cultivating, if we will adapt ourselves adaptably on the part of farmers to come out even at the end of the season.

Nothing has made me wonder more than the very rapid change in medical science since I could first remember. If doctors were still bleeding their patients in the nineties and early nineteenhundreds, think how far we have come since then! And remember that the patient has had to come along, too. No matter how much the doctor is revered, the patient has to submit to being shot and to taking pills. I cannot say that I have known people who went through all the practices from blister plasters to penicillin, but such things are possible. Only a small percentage to Mrs. Kirkland in her
